There is no truth, the Nation insists, in the report copied from the Limerick Observer, that a court-martial had been held on the militia-men concerned in the riot at Nenagh. The cases are to be handed over to the civil authorities. The Attorney-General is to prosecute. Eighty of the militia are prisoners. A considerable number of the 41st, 47th, and 55th regiments will be examined as witnesses. The parties implicated in the riots at the Templemore races in April last, when about one hundred of the military were wounded, will also be tried.

At Monkstown Races, Co. Cork, Dr. Ashe's Pick-me-up won a sweepstakes of 2 sovs each, 20 added—Steeplechase course; Mr. Gibbon's Ariel won the Railway stakes of 5 sovs, 50 added; Mr. Dillon's Blind Harper won a hurdle race of 3 sovs each, 40 added, On Tuesday, Mr. St. John's b. f., the Nugget, won a stakes of 2 sovs each, 20 added; and Mr. Dillon's Blind Harper won the Monkstown stakes of 5 sovs each, 50 added.

At Down Races, Mr. Bradshaw's Commoner won the North of Ireland Produce stakes; Mr. Courtray's Cockatoo won her Majesty's Plate; and Mr. Gray's Greencastle won the Ulster stakes. The Fly Handicap, of 1 sov. each, 10 sovs added, was won by Mr. Thompson's b. f. Ugly Doe. On Wednesday, Mr. O'Hara's Paddy Carey won the Tradesmen's Plate; Mr. Wynne's Miss Doll won the Railway Selling Stakes; and Mr. Corry's b. g. Rover won the Brownlow Stakes.

The prospectus has been issued of the London and North of Ireland Fishing and Fish Manure Company, with a capital of £50,000, in £10 shares. The objects are to introduce steam vessels as carriers from the fishing grounds to the railways, and to manufacture fish-manure from the refuse supplied. The fleet is to consist of screw steam carriers of 150 tons each, and twelve welled vessels from 50 to 90 tons.

As a disbanded private of the Wicklow militia, named Freeman, was passing through Maryborough, on his way to his native place, his wife was seized with the pains of labor, prematurely induced by hunger and fatigue. The woman was conveyed to a house, where she was delivered of a stillborn child. Her husband was indebted to the charity of a few individuals of the town for the means of burying the child and procuring nourishment for the unfortunate mother.

We are informed that among the number of tenders received for having the Dundalk and Enniskillen Railway finished, and opened to Enniskillen on the 1st of September, 1857, was one from Mr. McCormick, of the firm of Brassy and McCormick, the great contractor who finished the line from Enniskillen to Londonderry. Mr. McCormick completed the line from Enniskillen to Derry, four months before his time for doing so had expired.

A splendid screw steamship called the Demetrius arrived in Cork harbor a few weeks since from Marianople with a cargo of wheat. The Demetrius is the first steamer that ever left Marianople for commercial purposes, and the first steam vessel that has entered Cork harbor freighted with foreign corn.

Under the auspices of Viscount St. Lawrence, the master of the Kilkenny fox-hounds, and Mr. Bryan, the Kilkenny Moderator says that the forthcoming meeting at Jenkinstown must prove a great success. There are four races exclusively for Kilkenny horses—the Hunters' Plate, the Farmers' Plate, the Citizens' Cup, and the Citizens' Plate.

The eminent mathematician, Mr. Matthew Collins, senior moderator, and senior gold medalist, T. C. D., has been appointed resident mathematical master of Kilkenny College.

The following letter concerning the Louth Rifles appears in a Drogheda paper :

"This 'gallant regiment' arrived in our town, per railway, at one o'clock on Tuesday, and then marched, under their distinguished juvenile officers, up to old Millmount Barracks. On the next day (Wednesday) about 90 of them were paid off, and disembodied; and about 50 or 60 more on Thursday. These discharged men are zealously patronizing all the public houses, —some groups roaring 'The Red, White, and Blue,' whilst others, of a different temperament, are rejoicing in their freedom, cheering lustily for old Ireland, and singing, 'The Green above the Red.'

"On yesterday, about half a dozen of these disbanded Curragh heroes were 'marched in good order' before our exellent Mayor, to the Tholsel-office, charged with having been not in the best female company. They were all 'attention' whilst his Worship cleverly lectured and fined them, according to their respective military merits. Others, on this day, are sporting new baragon jackets, of good Irish manufacture, and by their steady demeanor, appear worthy of liberty, whilst seeking work; but I have not yet heard that any, either wild or tame, are actually crying after their officers."

A grand match has been played between the Dundalk Cricket Club and eleven Louth gentlemen. A considerable crowd witnessed the play. The game terminated in favor of the Cricket Club, by one run, leaving seven wickets to go down. The club entertained their competitors and some other gentlemen at a dejeuner on the grounds in the course of the day.

H. H. Roe, Esq., late principal medical officer and ex-chief magistrate of her Majesty's settlements on the Gold Coast, has arrived at Coolfin, Queen's County, after having completed his third tour of service on the western coast of Africa.

Mr. Thomas McCabe, of Ardee, has been appointed schoolmaster of the Drogheda Workhouse, and the Commissioners have approved of his election. There are 412 paupers in the house, 120 of whom are in hospital.

P. H. Roe, Esq , late principal medical officer and ex-Chief Magistrate of her Majesty's settlements on the Gold Coast, has arrived at Coolfinn, Queen's county, after having completed his third tour of service on the Western Coast of Africa.

The Right Hon. Lord Chief Justice and the Right Hon. the Lord Chief Baron partook of a dejeuner at Lamberton Park, the mansion of the Hon. James Butler. This gentleman is to be High Sheriff of the Queens County next year.

In the list of Crimean heroes, upon whom the Emperor Napoleon has conferred the order of the Legion of Honor, appears the name of Sergeant James Grennan, 88th Connaught Rangers, a native of Maryboro'.

The Dundalk Democrat speaks of a sample of flax grown on the farm of Mr. Piers Murphy, of Corereagh; it is a very luxuriant crop, and measures nearly four and a half feet in length. The seed was purchased at Mr. Thomas Regan's, Dundalk.

The Kildare Rifles occupy Naas Barracks at present, relieving the Dublin City Militia, who are quartered at Beggar's-bush barracks, Dublin.

John Hicks, a deserter from the 21st Regiment, has been arrested at Maryborough, during the week. Hicks is from the banks of the Ohio.

The Rev, Martin Browne, P.P., of Balla, has been appointed Archdeacon, in room of Archdeacon MacHale, deceased.

Letter from Charles Gavan Duffy.

Melbourne, April 10th, 1856.

My dear Father Doyle—When this note reaches you it will be close upon twelve months since I placed my seat for New Ross at the disposal of my constituents. Their kindness, and yours, insisted upon substituting a year's leave of absence in place of the immediate resignation which I proposed. In acceding to your wishes I had but faint hopes that a year could materially alter the grounds of my resolution; nor has it, except to increase and strengthen them. The news from Ireland, unhappily, speaks only of intrigue and corruption triumphant, of the small party of honest public men daily more embarrassed and helpless in the midst of popular apathy and of new aggressions upon the liberty of the last class in whom public spirit lingered. I have no right or inclination to play the censor, fifteen thousand miles away, upon particular events, which men at home witness in silence; enough that the reasons which have compelled me to withdraw, have not diminished, but increased. I hope, therefore, you have long since taken the necessary steps to have my seat vacated, and to restore, with my thanks and gratitude to the incorruptible burgesses of New Ross, the right of selecting their representative.

When I left Ireland I thought my position in this country would be long one of retirement from public affairs; but it has proved otherwise. I have been drawn back to them by a reception of such generous and exuberant confidence as left me no choice. If a man can find a second home on the earth, I have found it here. I arrived when a new Constitution, of a more liberal power, and more popular in basis than Grattan's in Ireland, was about to inaugurate a new era. Hitherto the boundless public lands, the public revenue, all the patronage of the country, and till recently the gold, were claimed by the crown of England, hereafter every rood of land, every shilling of taxes, every grain of gold, and every public office from the highest to the lowest, with the sole exception of the office of Governor, belong exclusively to the people of the country, acting through a Parliament of their own election. In this new Parliament no less than six constituencies have invited me to represent them; and I have selected one whose chief town is Belfast, who belong largely, I believe, to the land from which that name was imported. A great future undoubtedly awaits this country; and I remark with a mere feeling of pride and sorrow, that the most distinguished men in power and position, men certain to largely influence its destiny, belong to a people denied Constitution, Legislature, or Government at home. You know that people I believe.

You will be anxious to hear something of this country. Judging certainly by the worst months, Febuary and March, the climate is overpraised in the usual books of travel and description. The hot winds prevalent in these months and the swarm of insect life, are hard to endure. But in winter I am assured it is delicious; as indeed many days and weeks are in summer. But what is of more importance, there is a certain competence and even opulence, here for every industrious and sober man, whatever be his calling. Every ejected tenant who can make his way to these shores may now be owner and landlord of a better farm than the one he left behind. To many men and women, however, nothing is compensation for the tender and mystical ties which bind us to our mother country, and I will never counsel any man to leave Ireland who is able, and content, to live there. But it is my solemn conviction that all who must, or will emigrate, will do best to come to Australia.

Whenever I look on the map of Ireland and see the familiar names, so many of which are associated in my memory with men whose labors and friendship I shared, I promise myself before I die, to see you all again. But God knows; at best many a year of toil must intervene before I cross the Equator again. Whether we meet or not, I will always count among my most precious possessions the confidence and affection of the friends and kith and kin, whom I left behind "on the holy hills of Ireland."

Believe me, my dear Father Doyle, always affectionately yours,

C. G. Duffy.

Rev. Thomas Doyle, Ramsgrave.

THE IRISH MILITIA.

We transfer to our columns an article under this heading from the Dundalk Democrat. In our modest judgment, it is the best we have seen on the subject :

The disbandment of the militia is rapidly proceeding. Mayo, Down, and several other counties, have already witnessed the corps raised by them, dissolved; and all but the staffs have gone to seek for homes and work wherever they can find them. They are now, we suppose, destined to cut down corn instead of Russian Cossacks, and to dig out potatoes, and level ridges and drills, instead of constructing huts, redoubts, and trenches on the tented field. They have, in fact, been sent to convert their swords into reaping hooks, and their bayonets into spades.

Many persons are apprehensive that the members of this force, when scattered through the country, will become troublesome customers to the police; evil spirits stirring up strife; and that there will, consequently, be heavy criminal calendars to engage the attention of the judges, the crown lawyers, and jurors, at next spring assizes. They state that the militia had better times, both as regards food and clothing, than they had been accustomed to; and that they will endeavor, "by hook or by crook," to live as well after, as before, they were disbanded. The conjecture may be pretty correct; but we are certain that any terrible characters amongst the disbanded force, will not have it all their own way; and that they will be taught to live as quietly as any other civilians in the country. If they desire to live comfortably, let them learn to work hard; to be industrious, sober, and attentive to their business, whatever that may be.

A writer in the Kilkenny Journal suggests that every man of them should be enabled to go to America or France, to enlist in the armies of those countries. He says a shilling subscription would soon raise the amount necessary to defray the expenses of their emigration. But why send them away in this manner? Who knows what may turn up in a day or two? Suppose America and England should come to blows; that the alliance with France might fall to pieces; that Napoleon the Third, who is evidently suffering from ill-health, should unfortunately die; and that a Republic should be established in place of the Empire, with a determination to avenge Waterloo; who can say what the Irish nation would resolve on accomplishing for itself?

We think it better to preserve amongst us the members of the disbanded militia? They, by mixing with the rural population, will, doubtless, serve in a great measure to dispel that dread of war which many peasants entertain, and do a great deal to remove the terrors its approaches generally excite.

Had the Irish Militia as a body, gone into action, we have no doubt they would have distinguished themselves, for there were many brave men in its ranks, full of that noble Celtic fire which, if properly led in the shock of battle, sweeps all before it, and in the midst of blood and flame and carnage, carries death and destruction to the foe.

The Irish Militia embarked in the cause of a nation which is the greatest enemy of God and man. Many of them, however, were driven to take that step by cold and hunger, and we are not to look down on them with contempt, on that account. They are now in that condition in which every male adult in the country should be if we were properly ruled. They are drilled, and taught the use of fire-arms. They know all the evolutions, and can practise every mystery of the fighting art. Let us, then, respect them on that account. We may yet require them to defend the island from danger, to expel its foes, to rout its enemies, and protect our homes, our green fields, our altars and firesides from the robber and the invader.

FUNERAL ORATION BY FATHER KENYON.

From the singularly eloquent and touching sermon delivered by the distinguished Parish Priest of Templederry, on the death of the Rev. Mr. Comyn, P. P., we make the following extracts :

FATHER COMYN'S CONNECTION WITH KILKEE.

God lent him to the world at large; and he walked through the world at large with front erect and heavenward, no hollow sham, no empty husk of humanity, but a right royal specimen of God's noblest handiwork. God lent him to Ireland; and he stamped traditions on the cliffs of Kilkee, identifying the Irish chieftain with the Irish priest, as truly and as fully as those olden legends which haunt and hallow the rock of Cashel, where Cormac McCullenan, the bishop-king, wore on his twice anointed temples a mitre and a crown. God lent him to Kilkee; and this spacious church, in which we are to-day assembled, and the grand school-house adjoining, and many of the improvements, both external and internal, of the other churches of the Union—in all which his own private income was largely invested—and that road along the cliffs, unrivalled throughout the spacious earth for the variety, the sublimity, and the beauty of its scenery—all these attest that he was not lent to Kilkee in vain.

HIS TRUTH AND CHIVALRY.

In an age of conventionalities and expediences, and hypocrisies and artifices, amidst a people almost degraded into brutes by centuries of barbarous oppression, robbed year by year, of lands and houses, and corn and cattle, and stockings and shoes, nay, almost robbed of human faces and human souls, starving from day to day upon such garbage as could not well bear exportation by sea, Father Comyn was seen moving through these parishes in the prime of his years and vigor. His port was stately; his aspect frank and genial; sweetness and strength were blended in his manly countenance. The man, in short, was complete in all his outward developments. But what then? In an age of conventionalities and artifices, was that man conventional and artificial? Of a degraded race, did he inherit a slavish spirit? Rather, to a marvellous degree, was our departed brother in the best meaning of the phrase a free child of nature. Innocent, ingenious, impulsive, without guile—a large heart in his bosom, red blood, and plenty of it in his heart—such as he lived in this outward age, abating merely the accidents of his education and profession, he might have lived among the ancient Greeks, and by that imaginative people been worshipped as a demi-god. In the age of the Crusades his banner should flutter amongst the foremost, and for intrepid gallantry and generous devotion to the Cross, the hosts of Europe should furnish no worthier soldier. In the ages of chivalry, no more valiant Paladin, no more courtly knight should roam the earth, to defend unprotected innocence or to exterminate ruffian wrong.

HIS CHARITY AND SWEET TENDERNESS.

Of his Christian charity I shall only allude to one instance, but it is a striking one. You all know Father Corry, from of old. He had been for many years a laborer in this vineyard, and he never spared his labor. After he had gone on another mission, it pleased God to afflict him with paralysis. He was poor, old and helpless. What was he to do? Ah, he remembered how often he had known Father Comyn to befriend the friendless, to shelter the homeless, to clothe the naked, to feed the hungry, and he said within his enfeebled mind—I shall betake me to Father Michael, and in his charity he will shelter and protect me, and the communion of his generous soul will solace my sad infirmity—and he was not disappointed. Father Michael shared with him as with a brother; and as years rolled on the charity of the protector ripened into affection, and the hope of the befriended strengthened into confidence, until it became affecting to witness their daily intercourse. Father Michael felt lonesome if the poor invalid's place at his table chanced at any time to be empty. Father Corry forgot his paralysis while sporting with his muscular prop. Shall I omit the pathetic conclusion of the story. The strong oak was laid low by a sudden gust of fate, with all its branching honors, and the feeble reed which it had sheltered from the storms of life bowed its head amain, and they rest together.

HIS PATRIOTISM.—A SOLDIER LOST TO THE CAUSE OF FREEDOM.

Father Comyn was a patriot from the centre of his being to the uttermost verge of it. His heart glowed with the love of Fatherland. He loved the seas, and the skies, and the green hills, and the gray ruins of holy Ireland. The traditions of her ancient glory were treasured in his memory. Her immemorial idioms flowed melodious from his tongue. Her old music he drank in with a passionate intensity; and the harps of her bards being mute, he was fain to bid it welcome from pipes of her pipers. He was a true, and full, and perfect type of the Irish Celt. Roman Catholic to the core—anti-Saxon to the death, with all the characteristic virtues, and the equally characteristic defects of that generous, loving, brave, faithful, credulous, careless, unfortunate race. In the days of St. Laurence he would have resisted, a crucifix on his breast and a sword in his sinewy hand, any settlement of the Saxons within the seas of Ireland. In the days of O'Neil he would have subscribed, and with a postscript, his reproachful but irreproachable letter to Pope John. At the time of the Confederation, make sure he joined the body guard of Grattan, and scouted the excommunications of the Bishops of the pale. Even in '98, in Wexford county, I doubt if he had not linked himself to the fortunes of Father Roach, to help them, peradventure, to a happier issue. As things were, it is not my purpose either to censure or to approve the precise forms in which his patriotism was actually cast—the precise applications to which it was actually directed. I only testify that the patriotism was genuine, ardent and disinterested; and I conclude the subject by expressing my sorrow that at a time, more urgent perhaps than many people dream of, when God, the avenger, may have decreed to summon guilty empires before the bar of His justice, and to award them their long delayed but inevitable retribution—for nations having no spiritual future must meet their deserts on earth—my deep sorrow that at such a moment Ireland has been deprived of even one, such fearless heart, of even one such stalwart arm.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

GALWAY.

The Pollok Ejectments—Galway, July 29.—At the last Assizes there were eighteen cases brought down on trial, in the first of which the Plaintiff being non-suited, the remainder were withdrawn. Subsequently the Court of Common Pleas, set aside the non-suit, and awarded a venire de novo. At the present assizes there were only three cases entered for trial. They excite great interest, as did also the presence of Mr. Pollok himself.

The first case tried was that of Pollok and wife v. Luke Tiernan and others.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff.

The two other cases were then about being proceeded with, when an arrangement was entered into by which the defendants consented to a verdict for the plaintiffs, without costs, and with stay of execution till the 1st of November next, all rent to that day to be forgiven.

COUNTY TIPPERARY (NORTH RIDING).

Murder of Dennis Curley—The Tipperary Mutiny.

Nenagh, July 28.—This day having been fixed for the trial of the several persons connected with the mutiny in the North Tipperary Militia, and the murder of Dennis Curley, a soldier of the 41st Regiment, the court-house, when Judge Moore sat at 9 o'clock, was crowded.

The Right Hon. the Attorney-General, Messrs. George, Q. C., Lynch, Q. C., Rollestone, Q. C., O'Hara, and Waller prosecuted; and Messrs. Johnstone and Hemphill were assigned for the prisoner, Mr. Armstrong, Q. C., being unable to act, owing to the business in the Record Court not being finished.

The prisoner, Stephen Burns, who is a very young man, and of mild appearance, was dressed in the uniform of the militia.

The Attorney-General then proceeded to state that the prisoner, Stephen Burns, was charged with the crime of wilful murder. On Monday, the 7th of July, the North Tipperary Militia were stationed in Nenagh, when a mutiny broke out among some evil-disposed men. The men had been enrolled for five years, but the force was one which, by law, could not be kept up except for 28 days' training in each year, after peace had been obtained. The consequences resulting from that mutiny would not have followed but for the fact that the militia were encouraged by the rabble of the town. The Attorney-General then proceeded to advert to the fact that when the mutiny commenced, the officers had the ammunition removed to the gaol, but a small portion fell into the hands of the militia. The regular forces were sent for to Templemore, and arrived under the command of Col. Hart, who commanded the provisional depot. The soldiers marched to the barracks at Summer Hill, and having got in, were drawn up on three sides of the square, and sentries were told off, including the deceased soldier of the 41st—a man who shared all the dangers of Alma and Inkermann, to fall at last on his return home. Some of the militia remained outside the gate, and the evidence of several witnesses proves that the prisoner fired no less than three times into the barracks, and by the last shot Curley was mortally wounded. Having clearly stated the case, the following witnesses were produced:

John M'Nally examined by Mr. George—I am a private in the 41st Regiment; I was quartered in Templemore before the 8th of July; about 500 of us marched into Nenagh that day; we marched to Summer Hill barracks. I saw the prisoner out the wicket; he was immediately outside; I heard him say that he would have a crack at the medal-man; Curley had a ribbon on him; that was said about two or three minutes after I opened the wicket; I saw him bring his firelock up above his hip-bone, and take it down again; he brought it up again, fired, and Curley fell. I heard a cry outside, the man is killed; I did not know the prisoner before that day; after that shot Burns turned his back, and walked away; I saw him in the prison the next day.

To the Jury—The prisoner raised the gun before he fired; he did not put the gun to his shoulder; it is not usual to fire without raising the gun to one's shoulder; at the time I saw the prisoner fire, five militiamen were standing together.

Patrick Killikelly examined by Mr. Rollestone—I am a soldier in the 41st; I was near the wicket, and could see persons outside; I saw the prisoner outside; I heard the prisoner say, "Clear the way until I have a crack in among them;" after that he brought his piece down; he then stepped up again to the front and said, "I will have a crack at the medal-man;" Curley had a medal; I then saw the prisoner fire the shot; the man fell immediately; the piece was pointed towards the deceased; pointed out the place where the prisoner was standing to a surviver.

Timothy Kennedy examined by the Attorney-General—I am in the Tipperary Militia; I know the prisoner; I recollect the 8th of July; the prisoner had a firelock; I was near Kelly's public house; I saw Burns go across the street, and fire under the large gate of the barracks; he then retired back towards Kelly's house again; I saw him place the firelock on the butt end and begin to load again; he then went across to the small gate, and presented the muzzle of his gun to the key-hole, and fired; he then knelt down partly, and partly looked in; he retired towards Patrick street, and then in three or four minutes he loaded again; he put his hand back to a civilian, but I can't say if he got anything from him; he then advanced to the large gate, and from that removed to the wicket; there was a civilian between him and the gate, and I think he put his gun upon the shoulder of a civilian, and fired, and one of the regular soldiers fell; the wicket was partly open; Burns then retired back; he then went towards Castle street; I heard a great alarm given; before the prisoner fired the third shot, the civilians thought to stop him, and I heard him say he thought he had one down, and he wanted to have another; he was very hearty in liquor.

William Fitzgerald examined—I am a private in the North Tipperary Militia; I was stationed in Pound-street barracks; I left for the Summer Hill Barracks; the gates were shut; the troops of the line were inside; after I got into the barrack square, I saw a soldier wounded; when I came out of the barracks, I saw the prisoner alongside the wicket; I heard Burns say he had been after knocking two down, and he expected to knock down the third; Stephen Burns loaded his piece again; I did not see him afterwards.

Cross-examined—I am three months in the militia; I saw John Burns, one of the militia, fire into the barrack yard; I only saw Burns fire the one shot; he had it up to his shoulder; the door was partly opened when the prisoner fired.

John Potts examined—I am in the Tipperary Militia; I know the prisoner; I saw him fire the first shot on his knees under the wicket; I saw him fire three successive shots; I saw him load again; I saw a man give him ammunition, and he fired through the key-hole of the same gate; I saw him charge again, and fire a third shot; he fired through the same gate when partly open; I could see through the gate then; I saw some of the regulars inside when he fired; after he fired I heard Burns say he had killed one, and he thought he had killed one before; I was about two yards from him at the time—just beyond him.

Mr. Johnston addressed the jury on behalf of the prisoner, and dwelt in strong terms upon the conduct of the Government towards the militia. The men in the North and South Ridings had furnished no less than 1550 men to the force, and upwards of 400 had volunteered to fill the vacancies in the regulars occasioned by deaths or disease; and, after all their services, they had been cast off like an old shoe when no longer wanted; and no doubt if they were wanted again for their 28 days' training, they would be available only as a highland regiment, for the Government sought to strip them even of their trousers. Having exonerated the officers of the regiment from all blame, counsel proceeded to review the evidence, and submitted that there was not sufficient proof of Burns having fired the shot; that several men were firing at the same time, and that a supposition existed that the prisoner being a smaller man than deceased, the ball should have taken an upward direction, if he fired, and not incline downwards; and finally, he urged that even if the jury were to convict, the excitement that day and the circumstances would reduce the offence to manslaughter.

The Hon. Cornwallis Maude examined---I am Lieutenant-Colonel of the Tipperary Militia; I was in Nenagh on the 7th of July; some of the men were allowed to go away.

A question was asked as to whether the bounty of the men was paid on their leaving, and their clothes left them.

The Attorney-General objected to the question as not having any bearing on the case.

Counsel submitted that the evidence was admissable to reduce the case to one of manslaughter, owing to the excitement the militia were in at the time.

Judge Moore was clearly of opinion that the evidence was irrelevant.

Mr. George, Q. C., spoke to evidence, and Judge Moore then proceeded to charge the jury, laying down the legal position that if the prisoner was the man who fired the shot, the prisoner was the murderer and nothing else.

The jury having retired for an hour, returned with a verdict of "guilty."

The foreman, Mr. Sadleir, then read a letter in which the jury begged leave to recommend the prisoner to mercy.

NENAGH, Tuesday.—Thos. Carr, a lance corporal in the Tipperary Militia, was indicted for firing at Charles Fox with intent to murder, and in a second count for firing at a constable named Meagher. The Attorney-General stated the case. Among the militia rioters was the prisoner, and he fired on the soldiers of the escort when they halted, and also at the police, taking the gun of another man and kneeling deliberately in order to effectuate his purpose.

Mr. Johnstone, for the prisoner, contended that there was not sufficient evidence to identify him as having taken any active part; that he could not be said to have fired at any of the individuals specifically named in the indictment.

The prisoner received an admirable character from the Rev. Mr. Studdert.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty of firing with intent to murder some of the military.

Cornelius Ryan, William Cummins and Edward Lahan threw themselves upon the mercy of the court and of the executive. They acted under the excitement of the moment, and under the idea that they were to have been deprived of the advantages promised to them when enlisting.

Samuel Lawrence, a civilian, was placed at the bar, charged with inciting and assisting Stephen Burns in the murder of Patrick Curley.

The Attorney-General applied to postpone this case until next assizes.

Mr. Johnstone proposed bail for the prisoner. The application was refused, without prejudice.

John Bannon and Thos. Carr were then sentenced to be transported for the term of fifteen years. The prisoners were somewhat astounded at the sentence, but made no observation.

Stephen Burns was then brought up. Judge Moore addressed him, and said, I cannot say there is no hope, but all I can say is, that I will transmit the recommendation of the jury to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant. The judge then proceeded to pass sentence of death and execution upon a day to be subsequently named.

The men found guilty of attacking the military near Templemore at the races, were sentenced to ten months' imprisonment.

Judge Moore intimated that he had altered his opinion as to the validity of the three counts in the indictment, charging the Tipperary Militia with firing generally at her Majesty's troops without naming the latter specifically; he would not reserve the case for the Court of Criminal Appeal should his views after full consideration remain the same as at present.

THE TEMPLEMORE RIOTS.

Saturday, July 26.—James Hargrave, James Fogarty, Jeremiah Malley, Patrick Dee, John Fahy, Daniel Quinlan, Patrick Knockton, Richard Cnmmins, James Byrne, Thamas Maher and Michael Whelan, were given in charge for unlawful assembly and riotous conduct on the 9th of April last, at Farrenderry, near Templemore.

The prisoners Hargrave, Malley, Dee, Fahy, Cummins and Byrne were also indicted for assaults on individuals.

Mr. George, Q. C., stated the case for the prosecution.

Major Robert Hume examined by Mr. O'Hara—Was Brevet Major in the 55th Regiment; was stationed at Templemore in April last; was at the races of Farrenderry on the 3d of April; went towards the tents about 5 o'clock in the evening in consequence of seeing a crowd of soldiers and country people throwing stones at each other; some officers of the line endeavored to make the soldiers desist; he was enabled to bring away a number of the soldiers into the field; they were a good deal excited; saw some broken heads; received no injury himself; does not believe any stones were thrown at him individually; knows the railway bridge, which is about 200 yards from the field into which he brought the soldiers; a party of police came up and dislodged a crowd of country people, who were throwing stones from the bridge into the field; there were some hundreds of country people on the bridge and along the road; went to the head of his men to bring them to barracks; found the hedges lined with country people; went in front of the soldiers, ten or twelve of whom accompanied him; witness held up his hand and said, "For God's sake let us go home, men, and have done with this pelting, all the soldiers want is to go to barracks." A volley of stones was flung after he said this; witness was the only man left standing, the soldiers who accompanied him having been knocked down; two or three were very seriously injured; he placed four of them on a donkey's cart, and brought them away; Mr. Scott, ensign, 47th regiment, was placed on a car insensible, with some other wounded men; was not pelted when he was by himself; but whenever a redcoat came near him stones were thrown; saw numbers of men and officers bleeding during the evening; there were between sixty and seventy under treatment.

On cross-examination he admitted the soldiers used their cross-belts; the quarrel arose in consequence of the soldiers having rescued a pickpocket who had been arrested by the people.

Sub-constable Bevan examined by Mr. George, Q. C., proved that Hargraft threw stones on the day of the riot.

Private William Keley proved that he saw John Brady receive a blow on the head from Jeremiah Malley.

Cross-examined, The soldiers and the people were all very much excited, both may have been to blame.

Private John Knight, examined by Mr. John F. Waller, proved that he was assaulted by Hargraft on the day of the riot.

Private John Brady proved that he received a blow of a stone, but could not say from whom.

Several witnesses corroborated the circumstances of the riot.

Mr. Edward Johnstone addressed the jury for the defence.

James Rowan examined by Mr. Johnstone—Deposed that he saw the prisoner, Byrne, at Templemore after the races, and that he could not have been back in Farrenderry in time for the riot.

Michael Bannon proved that he and the prisoner Byrne left the course as soon as the row began without taking any part in it, and that he remained with witness until he was arrested.

Constable Thomas Bolger proved that he arrested Byrne at the instance of a soldier of the 55th, who stated that he knocked down a man with a stone.

Mr. Lloyd, one of the jury, was sworn, and stated that Byrne's character was excellent as well as that of the whole family.

Several witnesses were examined to prove that the prisoners did not throw stones or take any part in the riot.

John Lanagan, Esq. J. P., proved that he went in the tents in the fair when the rioting began in order to endeavor to preserve order; all were fighting—military and people; he saw one of the officers endeavoring to get the soldiers away; the soldiers pursued the people towards the railway bridge and drove them over it; the people then turned on the soldiers and flung stones at them; saw the soldiers throwing stones and using their cross belts; never saw men who exerted themselves more than the officers for the restoration of peace, but without effect; the police also exerted themselves with the subject.

Michael Cosgrave, a private of the 55th regiment, proved that he was with the prisoner John Maher all the day of the riots, and that he did not strike any one, or throw any stones, and could not have done so without witness's knowledge.

Mr. O'Hara replied on behalf of the crown.

His Lordship charged the jury, who found all the prisoners guilty, save Michael Whelan and James Byrne, who were acquitted. Sentence deferred.

CORK COUNTY GRAND JURY.

At the meeting of the Grand Jury, the Foreman, J. L. Heard, Esq., M. P. called their attention to the present distribution of the police force in Ireland, and particularly of the Co. of Cork, with a view of having measures taken for a fairer and more equitable division according to the area and population of each respective county. He also stated that a portion of the police force in Cork had been formerly sent into Kerry and Tipperary for whom the county of Cork was still taxed. A committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Garde, Somerville, and Coltsman, to draw up a memorial to the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the subject. Four members of the present Board of Superintendence, were drawn out and four new members added.

Answers to Correspondents.

"The Two Men." (Albany)—Your contribution has some point, but the execution is not equal to the idea. It is too long. If our correspondent would be advised by us he will study to concentrate; there is much more talent necessary to judiciously curtail than to "spin out," but it is the fault or misfortune of young writers that they do not, or will not understand it. We are much obliged by our correspondent's compliments: and shall be glad to hear from him, if he will keep our suggestion in mind.

Our industrious and sprightly friend, Kilmainham, has sent us the continuation of his rambles through Dublin. He promises to bring us all through the city before he stops. He writes—

Still going westward along this street (Thomas st.) we pass the house No. 187, the rear office of which formed Emmet's depot, and arrive at the house No. 151. It was in this house Nicholas Murphy lived in '98; in this house Lord Edward Fitzgerald was captured, on the 19th of May, in that year. Although the house is now in the occupation of a Scotch firm—Greame & Dunhill, wool-brokers—we believe these gentlemen have the courtesy to allow a visit to Lord Edward's bed-room. Ascending the stairs, which are narrow and winding, we come to the lobby, on the third floor. On the left hand, rear of the house, is a bed-room. We enter. It is small—not more than 18 feet by 20, and 8 feet high. On the side opposite the door is the window; on the left hand is a small fire-place; against this wall Lord Edward's bed was placed. Here, within this little room, upon these boards, what a terrible tragedy was enacted! Fancy that fearful death-struggle—one man against five, rolling in mortal combat upon the floor! Even although armed only with a dagger, Lord Edward would have overpowered his enemies but for Sirr's pistol bullet. "He sprang up from the bed," says Murphy, "like a lion." When Swan saw the dagger with him, he thrust his hand into his breast-pocket, where he had a brace of loaded pistols. Lord Edward saw this at a glance, and struck at Swan's hand while in the pocket, actually pinioning it to the breast. By this stroke, Swan lost the two middle fingers of that hand. Lord Edward had Swan down upon the floor under him, and had the other two nearly overpowered, when Sirr arrived. He stood at the door, took deliberate aim, and shot Lord Edward in the shoulder. The blood dashed out in a jet against the wall, and the stain remains on it to this day. He fainted from the wound, and while insensible was brought down stairs in one of the sheets taken off the bed. One of the monsters—a drummer—kicked at the senseless body. It was placed in a sedan chair, and, just as it was being removed from the door, a desperate attempt was made to rescue it from the captors, which would have succeeded had not a reinforcement of cavalry arrived on the spot. Lord Edward lingered until the 5th of June, on which day he died in Newgate Prison.

Mr. Blaueer writes to correct an error as follows: "In your last issue, on folio 300, under the head of 'Literary and Artistic News,' you say: 'The number of journals published in Switzerland, which has a population of 800,000 souls, is 263,' etc. As a native of the Republic of Switzerland, I can assure you that the population of that country exceeds the figure of 3,000,000 souls this day. A census was taken in 1850, stating that the population of said republic is 2,965,000 or more. I am not quite certain, but I am sure that it was over 2,960,000. You made therefore a mistake of 2,165,000 souls. Expecting that you will excuse me for this liberty, I make use of this occasion to assure you of my highest devotion, and remain, &c."

We gladly print this correction of a very ridiculous error, which was not made, though innocently reprinted by us, and feel obliged to Mr. Blaueer for his note. Upon consultation with the statistics given in Thom's Official Directory for 1853, we find the population of Switzerland set down as 2,895,178.

We shall regularly send a copy of the News to any part of Ireland, on receipt of subscription at the rate of 16s. sterling per annum.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 23, 1856.

THE CAMPAIGN.

The Democrats make little or no noise. Buchanan demonstrations are few. They take place without much parade. The speeches sustaining the Cincinnati nomination commend themselves calmly to the judgment of the public. They explain rather than excite. Tammany Hall has neither a Nye nor a Curtis to depute to the country. The juicy jokes of the former, the dainty diction of the latter, encounter no rivalries on the stump. Photographists and Biographers have had few orders from Wheatland. Messrs. Ackerman & Miller, of Nassau street, in the midst of patriotic paint-pots and bristles, deplore the economy which the Democratic clubs betray in their patronage of the fine arts. The Rocky Mountains are covered with banners, and panoramic posters. The benign features of Mi-lord Fillmore oscillate night and day between the chimney-stacks of our crowded thoroughfares. The Egyptian Museum in Broadway, the City Hall in Brooklyn, and many other edifices and regions of less note, are fanned by the swaying medallions which associate the Irish name of Jackson with inhospitable sentiments and proscriptive prejudices. Bands of music, torches, the fieriest harangues, everything that can agitate the crowd are in play to aid the factious predominance of the North, or popularize the dull bigotry which Know-Nothingism would substitute for the fraternal spirit that has hitherto prevailed.

The friends of James Buchanan—and they are the millions—contrasted with the followers of his provincial opponents, are absolutely tame. Their silence proceeds from the deep consciousness of strength.

There is no uproar on deck when the ship, coming in from sea, smoothly moves up the harbor to her anchorage. Where the channel is a narrow one, or breakers threaten, or new hands are at the helm, or a dark-lantern lights the binnacle, it is natural that great excitement should prevail. The certainty of good fortune in the one case, the uncertainty in the other, explains the difference of attitude and tone which exists at this moment between the Democracy and the experimentalists in political sectionalism and religious intolerance, by whom the masses of the people are opposed.

They who have faith in the Democratic principles enunciated at Cincinnati, who believe in the staunch conservatism of the Democracy, and the controlling power of the memories and maxims flowing from the Revolution, require no shouts or bonfires to convince them that the Democratic candidate shall be the winner in this fight.

Men with less faith, however, in the fidelity of the people and the sacred influences of the past, may deduce from the events of the last few weeks assurances that such shall be the case. Not the wreck, but the compact perpetuation of the Union, is the promise conveyed in those events. Kentucky and North Carolina predict it. The votes of those States are pledged to Buchanan and Breckinridge. They have anticipated the fall of the leaves, and the autumnal decline of Messrs. Fremont and Fillmore.

The accession of such men as Benjamin, of Louisiana, Rufus Choate and Reverdy Johnson, contain the evidences of success. Distinguished Whigs, prosperous and eminent at the bar, two of them classified in the history of the Republic with the superior men of the Senate, they bring to the Democratic party in this contest cultivated minds, eloquent voices, a fund of proved patriotism, and a large representative sanction. Mr. Choate's letter, manfully declaring for Buchanan, is a vivid exposition of the position and principles of the three contending parties, the dangers which menace the unity of the States, and the means of averting them. To this end, he supports the Cincinnati nomination. Old associations have no weight with him—they cease to bind him—he casts them off when the Union is in peril, and the Democratic party appears to him the only one that possesses the dispcsition and power to save it. An incident like this is worth thousands of banners and miles of illuminated transparencies.

The action of the Irish and Catholic newspapers throughout the States, their unanimous and hearty concurrence in favor of Mr. Buchanan, decides the vote of the tens of thousands they represent.

The Boston Pilot; Buffalo Sentinel; Catholic Herald and Catholic Instructor, Philadelphia; Catholic Mirror, Baltimore; Catholic Miscellany, Charleston; Catholic Standard, New-Orleans; Catholic Telegraph, Cincinnati; Detroit Catholic Vindicator; Freeman's Journal, New-York; Irish News, New-York; Irish American, New-York; Leader, St. Louis; Pittsburgh Catholic; Truth Teller, New-York; St. Louis Evening Leader, all support the Democratic ticket.

To any appeals, founded on differences of nationality and religion, we are decidedly opposed. In such a contest as the present, every man should vote from an American position, solely and thoroughly in an American spirit, with the determination to acquit himself loyally to the Commonwealth. He should not consider what may benefit Ireland, or Greece, or Schleswig-Holstein, but what will best serve the noble country from which he derives a new existence. Still less should religious partialities determine the complexion of his vote.

Liberal in mind as the Constitution through which he derives his citizenship, no preference, following and whispering him from the conventicle or church-door, should seduce him into conspiracies against the principle of religious liberty, which the founders of the Republic held to be paramount and supreme.

In presence of the Constitution there should be no sect, no race, no selfishness whatever. All sects and races should be one in citizenship and patriotism. Neither in the name of religion, nor under the remnants of a foreign flag should the emigrants from Ireland, or any other country outside, isolate themselves within the Union. Beneath the Stars and Stripes, amongst the millions who claim it as their inviolable ensign, there should be but one heart, one mind, one arm. In politics, Irishmen should thoroughly Americanize themselves. So should Germans and Slavonians—Asiatics and Europeans—all who come here.

In no factious mood, therefore, we allude to the Catholic and Irish press. Not as Catholics, not as Irishmen do we include the opinions of that press among the guarantees of success which cluster round the Cincinnati nomination. Were the sources of these opinions Calvinistic or Circassian, instead of being what they are, our reference to them would be equally as prompt. Those opinions are facts which neither we, nor any other spectators of the Presidential campaign, can overlook, and to which neither the friends nor the foes of Mr. Buchanan, however intense their Americanism, can afford to the indifferent. Nor should the lessons clearly educible from those facts be longer withheld.

For the last two years, Catholics have been scandalously maligned and outraged in America. The foulest garbage of the No-Popery days has been violently flung upon them. Gavazzi, the renegade rhetorician, was the male Alecto whose trumpet roused this fratricidal war. From his rank counsels, Know-Nothingism was born. Mr. Fillmore owes his nomination to an arrogant faction which, if in power, would ostracize the Catholic citizens of the republic. He is, virtually, the nominee of the Italian slanderer who, with the cross upon his black breast, would pile the blazing faggots about the Ancient Church.

With this faction Colonel Fremont is implicated. Behind his dusky banner he hides, and for a convenient season hushes, the Massachusetts fragment of the dark conspiracy. Governor Gardiner, who disbanded the Boston companies for the crime of having the blood of the O'Neills and the O'Donnells in their veins, stoutly backs the gallant colonel. Governor Ford, of Ohio, also backs him. Judge Trumbull, of Illinois, who supplanted James Shields on the stupid strength of the Know-Nothing movement, shakes the pillars of the Tabernacle with his boisterous praises of Fremont. These are some of the purest and noblest men in the Republican ranks. Robert Emmet and Horace Greeley could not fail to contribute heart and lustre to any cause. But trusted and honored as they are—gratefully thought of and warmly acknowledged as the truest of friends by many a shipwrecked soldier of liberty cast in here from European shores—they cannot reconcile to a programme, which is a declaration of war against the South, even those who stand indebted to them most. Genial and exhaustless as it is, their liberality cannot efface the blot or neutralize the poison which the affiliation with their party of some of the most rancorous Know-Nothings indellibly inflicts and radically infuses.

In the election of James Buchanan, the American Catholic beholds the defeat of the rude bigotry which threatens him with disabilities, a reign of proscription, insolence, and terror. He sees more. He beholds the triumph of those illustrious principles which gave the Word of God the freest field in which under the sun it has yet been sown, and for the oppressed and poor of all nations constituted this Republic an impregnable fortress and the stateliest asylum. In these views the European emigrant of every religious denomination shares, and since the integrity and full worth of the citizenship to which he aspires depends upon the executive supremacy of the Democratic party, to that party and the experienced statesmen who in the maturity of his intellect represents it, he devotes his heartiest sympathies, his influence, and vote.

The Foreign Vote, as it is contemptuously designated, will preserve the Union.

DEVIN REILLY.

We have received a note from "A Milesian," asking us if any stone marks the grave of Devin Reilly, and suggesting, if there is not, that a subscription be entered into for the purpose of raising one.

We thank our correspondent for reminding us of a subject upon which we have had some anxious thoughts, which were fully shared in by a few others—friends and comrades of the brave and brilliant Irishman, who, after a short, self-sacrificing life of passionate devotion to the Democratic ideas which he worshipped, in Ireland to exile, and in exile to death, sleeps the eternal sleep in the bleak grave-yard of St. Matthew's, Washington.

It was the intention of those comrades to place some suitable, if humble, registry of their love for, and faith in the departed, above his remains; whereby the future student might learn how much may be accomplished in a short life of despeate energy, and of how little avail are the misfortunes of the world to one with the genius to grasp the lessons of history—the pen to analyze and combine the great fragments which form a Democratic fabric, and a heart sustaining itself by its outlay; actually living like a benefactor by flushing its own fresh vigor into the theories it adopted. For many reasons sufficiently exonerating the delay, the preliminaries to the raising of such a tablet were postponed from time to time.

The letter of our correspondent, in its simple and large-hearted suggestiveness, reminds us that however self-satisfactory were our ideas, they were not devoid of selfishness, in desiring to confine that privilege to a few, in which the thousands who were so revivified by Reilly's genius would gladly hope to participate.

This conviction induces us to at once lay the matter before the public. The plan more consonant, also, with the popular purposes of Reilly's life and labors. As he labored for the people, the people should not be debarred from attesting that appreciation for the dead patriot, which would have thrilled him with delight and renewed impetus in their behalf, had it visited him in the study.

To pay this respect to the struggles of Devin Reilly is an imperative duty resting on those thousands of his countrymen who beheld in him the young and daring champion of their wrongs, and the unbending, hopeful and passionate pleader for that vengeance they believed in as a national faith.

He worded their frenzies—made them strong in Truth—made their hearts known to themselves when living. Now that he is dead, let them give back some of those exuberant pulsations to his grave. As he wrote their present and future, let them chronicle his past.

There is not one of the political emigration which took place after '48 but can contribute, however little, to this just and patriotic object. In fact, the more widely extended the number of contributors, and the less diverse in amount the individual subscriptions, the more typical will it be of the large and equable Democracy of the Dead.

All Irishmen, of whatever faith or political hue, should feel proud of Reilly, and make the spot memorable where, probably, the most brilliant of their countrymen that have as yet found graves upon the bosom of the Republic, reposes.

In Broadway, '98 is written above the dust of Addis Emmet.

Around that historic shaft, standing as it does in the very heart of the city, the struggling, laborious, honest Irish element of it, daily turns as on an axle. Over the graves of McNevin, Sampson, and others, the historic chain is linked ; and from a simple slab in a Poughkeepsie graveyard, the tourist of the noble Hudson may learn, that there one of the chief springs of that dashing '98 war for independence in Ireland—one of the founders of the United Irish Society, Samuel Neilson, met the republican resting-place which he longed to die for "at home."

In Georgetown, too, not far distant from Reilly's grave, lies all that was mortal of Wolfe Tone's beautiful and noble wife Matilda. Is not the modern history of Ireland—a history dear to the struggles of Democracy and Justice—written on those grave-stones ?

In foreign graves and cathedrals the literary and political history of Ireland is written, from the time when Irish scholars, like Erigena and Clement and Albin, went over the European continent, having "wisdom to sell," to that when Hugh O'Neil, a blind exile, found eternal light in a Roman tomb ; and Sarsfield, and the chiefs of the Brigade, fought and died over Europe ; and even to our day, when Reilly, full of worship of those scholars and heroes, longed to rival both in life, which he surely did in death, in sleeping far away from his "own isle of flowers."

This history of Ireland, and it is the only authentic one written, must not be broken at the tombs of the men of '98. 'Forty-Eight is the next chapter ; and on Reilly's grave must the initial paragraph be written.

Nor will the loving duty devolve on Irishmen alone ; for we have spoken with some well-known Americans who express as ardent a desire to testify their admiration and respect for the intellect and heart of our friend as we do. To them, where personal friendship did not exist, he is known by his strenuous advocacy of an ennobling Democracy, which tended to illustrate and dignify some of the most prominent political movements of the day.

When his death was announced, the President of the Republic gave his personal condolence to the relatives of the deceased ; and senators, members of Congress, distinguished journalists, and other public and eminent men, united at a large meeting with the citizens of Washington in recording their belief that "in the death of Thomas Devin Reilly, a great public loss has been sustained—a loss to his fatherland, to his adopted country, and to the cause of progressive principles." At the time resolutions were made recommending a "lasting testimonial to his memory ;" and we have no fear, but that these distinguished men will claim to endorse those expressions of regard and sympathy.

As a starting point then, we invite such of his immediate or other friends as feel disposed to set the work actively in motion, and arrange preliminaries, to meet at the Irish News office, on the 3d Sept., at 3 P. M. In the meantime we will be glad to receive such opinions and suggestions as those at a distance, or who cannot attend, will convey by letter. After the meeting subscription lists will be opened, of which due notice will of course be given.

COSTA RICA OUT IN PRINT.

Men who struggle for humanity have need of that philosophic spirit which should be typical of it. It demands an almost supra-mortal equanimity to front the rush of fools "where angels fear to tread." There never arises a Washington but a Conway cabal conspires in the silence of jealous anxiety to thwart his designs. A dark-souled Georgy follows a Kossuth as night hankers after the illumination of the day. A greedy Reynolds drinks the blood of a Fitzgerald. A Schlessinger sells his master for the ineffaceable infamy of Arnold ; and even donkeys bray within the shadow of the lion's mane.

A most ridiculous circular has been printed in some of the New-York papers, ostensibly emanating from seven of General Walker's army, who were captured at and after the battle of Santa Rosas. It is an attack of the wildest and most harmless nature upon President Walker, reviewing his career, impugning his motives, ridiculing his honesty, sneering at his statesmanship, and exposing his "ignorance and folly." It warns American youth against joining him, and recommends him to the "tender mercies" of its readers, not as a Liberator, but a reckless chief of a pack of libertines ; not as a General, but the ambitious indicator of a group of gamblers ; not as a hard-fisted and bright-hearted pioneer of Empire, but as a sickly "humbug ;" not as a practical soldier made stern by the "dangers he has past," but as a visionary, a schoolboy, a dreamer "just arisen fresh from the perusal of such works as Prescott's 'Conquest of Mexico,' Dampier, Ovido and Peter Martyr, where he had read that Gil Gonzales de Avila had conquered Nicaragua with one hundred men and four horses."

Such is the pith of the Address, which occupies some five columns of the daily journals. To illustrate and sustain these sentiments, eight "reasons" are given, with commentaries, which might seriously recommend the seven signers as either cunning scoundrels or illiterate knaves, but that a few moments' thought so completely unriddles the secret of this pronunciamento as to add the more damning stigma of traitorism to their persons and acts.

It is but too plain that they are the diseased tail of that party of which Schlessinger was the brazen head.

That the stupidly vulgar paper was suggested by the imbecility of Costa Rica, as a forlorn hope to weaken General Walker's still growing and respected reputation in the States, and thereby preventing adventurous youths from lending the deadly ring of their rifle to his cause, is evident enough ; but theCosta Rican government should, at least, have corrected the bombastic periods of the over-zealous traitors in their pay. The excessive fear of the Costa Rican is noticeable in every line : their trembling exhibits itself in the most contemptuous drivelling, and the ill-digested heap of nonsense contradicts itself so effectually as to inspire the belief that the writers were not less secretly traitors to Costa Rica than openly to him whose energy made them worthy of purchase by his enemies.

The great litany of impudence, nonsense, obscurity and slang, was suggested no doubt by the desire to attract attention ; but unfortunately for Costa Rica, with increased attention it also creates a deeper impression of President Walker's capacity in having overcome not only the obstacles thrown in his way by open enemies, but the more relentless cowardice and villainy of pretended friends such as Schlessinger and his party.

The very means taken to ridicule Walker, but evoke respect for him, for the abuse of traitors is as a wreath of laurel for the hero.

The strong probability is that John McMahon,Desota county, Missouri; James Grey, England ; T. F. Fortmeier, Germany ; Wm. T. Johnson, Drummer, New-York ; Christian Fecht, Gunsmith, Germany ; Johann Mauyer, Germany, late of Orleans ; and John T. Dick, New-York, are not prisoners of Costa Rica at all. It will be remembered that at Santa Rosas, Schlessinger fulfilled his bargain with Costa Rica : and it is but reasonable to suppose from the nature of this document, that the signers then and after did likewise, setting themselves forth as prisoners in the stupid hope of giving importance and an air of impartiality to their statements. Mayhap the names attached are those of prisoners who did not write it, and that it is a forgery from beginning to end. The fact that the United States Consul at Punta Arenas, certifies that persons calling themselves by the above names "severally acknowledged" the signatures is no proof at all that they were the actual parties.

However, no matter how it originated, its statements cannot command anything save contempt.

THE FRANCISCANS IN ALLEGHANY.

The late Nicholas Devereux, of Utica, has left a precious memory to his children, the country of his adoption as well as the country of his birth, and the good old Church of which he was a shining lamp and a pillar. His probity, gentleness, spotless integrity, genuine piety, and active goodness were so widely known and felt, that his death was chronicled as an event in which the whole community of this and the neighboring States was deeply concerned. His generosity leaves towering above his honored grave many a fine evidence of his religious zeal. The Convent of the Franciscans, in Alleghany, the corner-stone of which was laid on Wednesday last by Archbishop Hughes, will consummate his crown of glory in this world. The land, to the extent of 200 acres, and the amplest funds for the completion of the sacred building, were the princely gifts he bequeathed to a saintly and laborious order in whose hands they are sure to improve a hundred-fold. It was denied him to see the first step taken in the good and great work he so designed. But his son, Mr. Devereux, of Ellicottville, will see that it be conducted to a success which shall realize the fondest prayers and loftiest aspirations of his father.

EUROPEAN INDEX.

The Baltic's advices (Liverpool, 6th inst.) confirms what we stated last week, that Marshal O'Donnell's star was in the ascendant in Spain. Madrid is tranquil.

The news from the provincial towns is of an equally pacific character. The insurgents are either calm in the cities, or flying imbecile through the country. The militia, numbers of whom had joined the insurrectionary movements, were being disarmed. The following from the Madrid Spoca, of the 31st ult., if it can be credited, is as short, sharp, and decisive an account of the finale of "O'Donnell's coup d'etat" as can be obtained—

"We waited until the last moment to communicate to our readers all the news of the day. Telegraphic dispatches received at 3 o'Clock P. M., announced that Catalonia was entirely pacified. This result was not attained without bloodshed. The rebel General Ruiz, with the Sub-Inspector of the militia of Lampurdan, Roger, at the head of 2,000 men mostly belonging to the militia, intrenched themselves at Llers. The Regiment of Navarre, commanded by Colonel Gonzalez, attacked them and put them to flight, and on the 25th, Ruiz, his Aid-de-Camp, the Mayor of the Place of Gerona, and the Commander of the Regiment of Africa, Juan Gangara, with all the persons implicated in the revolt at Gerona and in the Lampurdan, sought refuge in France, where they were arrested and removed to the interior. An extensive paper manufactory, La Aurora, was burnt, at Gerona, by the insurgents driven out at Barcelona and wandering in the neighborhood. Barcelona, Tarragona, and Lerida, are completely tranquil. Valencia has not moved. The column marching from that city to Arragon, disarmed on its way the militia of Segorbe. Teruel surrendered to Brigadier Damato, and its Republican Junto took to flight. Alcaniz also recognized the authority of the Queen. On the 23rd, the militia of Badajoz and several other towns of Estremadura were disarmed."

Through the despatches of the French Consul to his Minister of Foreign Affairs, the announcement is made in the Moniteur that the great stronghold of insurrection, Saragossa, had succumbed ; that Falcon, general of the Revolutionists, had escaped ; and that Dulce was in possession of the place. We have no details, but the announcement would seem truthful, as we are also informed that Napoleon had issued orders for the suspension of all military movements toward the frontier, which it is not likely he would do, were not these despatches to his government of a reliable nature.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times (August 3d) informs us that "the insurgent troops, whose numbers are not stated, but who are supposed to have amounted to 5,000 men, are to be distributed in different provinces, pending further decision respecting them. Judging from the system of forbearance hitherto pursued, it is probable that their offence will be overlooked." All sorts of speculations are afloat as to the probable nature and length of O'Donnell's administration. His overtures to take the lead of the progressista party, have not produced any distinct effect as yet. Two things are spoken of, which, if adopted, would sufficiently well explain that O'Donnell's administration will be that of the iron hand : they are the augmentation of the army, and the disorganization of the National Guard.

From Italy we have further particulars of an emeute on the frontiers of Parma. The insurgents, about seventy men, crossed into the Modenese territory, and marched to Tossola, near Carrara, in the belief that that place and Massa would rise. Disappointed in their expectations, they dispersed. Some arrests were made. A national display was expected at Genoa on the 27th ult., but the day passed over quietly. The Austrian government appears to be suspicious of the conduct of Sardinia towards Italy, the effect of which is a confidential communication from the French government (at Austria's solicitation) to Sardinia, hinting that she "might assume a less hostile attitude towards Austria, without lessening the influence she exercises in Italy." Whether the object of this "kind attention" will take the hint has not transpired. But what else can she do ?

An interesting feature of the European news is the report that the Emperor of the French is in a really critical state of health. His illness consists in a development of the malady of the spine, with which he has been long afflicted. He is able to attend to business and is not in immediate danger. He was to return to Paris on the 5th or 6th inst., but would leave on the 10th or11th, accompanied by the Empress, for Bairritz.

Advices from Constantinople of 28th ult., mention that the city will be entirely evacuated by the allies and the hospitals restored to the Turkish authorities by the 15th of this month.

Marshal Pelissier, on his landing at Marseilles, found a letter from the Emperor, creating him a Duke.

The Southern Argus, of Norfolk, Va., makes, as "matter of curiosity," a list of its exchanges, and gives at the same time the presidential proclivity of each. The Argus was either unjust or careless in the compilation of its journalistic litany, as it left us out altogether ; a fact perhaps not worthy of notice at another time, but somewhat interesting and significant at present ; as the Irish News, representing by far the largest, most industrious, and most intelligent number of Irish adopted citizens, of any journal—reflecting their wants and wishes as well as their allegiance to the American Constitution—has heartily and hopefully, and without a day's delay after the nomination, given to Mr. Buchanan its most enthusiastic "God speed" to the White House, to which he is clearly bent.

CALIFORNIA CORRESPONDENCE.

We have to state that our friend, Terence Bellew McManus, is not the writer of the letters which have appeared in this paper, sustaining the actions of the Vigilance Committee. He is decisively opposed to the Committee. He regards their proceedings as unconstitutional and revolutionary in the worst sense.

Under a serious threat, we have been called upon to give up the name of the gentleman who furnished us with the communications which have appeared in our columns in favor of the Committee. We shall do no such thing.

CATHOLIC LIBRARY AND LECTURES.

We are informed that the Catholic Library Association of this city are making the necessary arrangements for a series of Lectures to be given during the coming fall and winter. The first, by Dr. L. S. Ives, will be delivered on the 16th of September ; and the second, by T. F. Meagher, on the 30th.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

THE '82 CLUB — ITS ORIGIN AND OBJECT.

Davis was fruitful in bright projects. Growing out of his intense love of Ireland, every project he conceived served to enlighten and exalt her. The Library of Ireland came from his suggestion. In the depth of his rich brain that stream of national memories, songs, lessons of utility and heroism, had its rise. The maps of the country, which the Repeal Association distributed as premiums to its more active members, were designed by him. With his encouraging cheer, popular likenesses of Irish celebrities, such as Sarsfield, flew through the towns and villages, from the engraving-blocks of Holbrook. Irish novelists and painters caught from him many a hint which quickly developed itself in some new grace, some winning touch of beauty, or some great master-piece which told the whole history of the people. Carleton's Valentine McClutchy, and Haverty's Blind Piper, do more than illustrate the genius of their authors. They are lasting monuments to the suggestive patriotism of Davis. Animated by him, the Royal Irish Academy woke from its exclusiveness and routine. Smith O'Brien was elected member of it at a time when political passions were violently disturbed. O'Connell was in prison. The election of O'Brien was unanimous. The event was ascribed to the liberal spirit which Davis had inspired. No society in Dublin, sacred to literature and the fine arts, escaped his watchful eye, or was denied the benefit of his advice, his warm sympathies and manly praise. Throughout Ireland every society of the kind found in him a laborious friend and a generous patron. They felt the throbbings of his glowing heart, and with a diviner life dilated. The very stones of the University, where the memory of Grattan had been outraged, and the Furies frequently disturbed the benignity of the Muses, lost much of their hard grain and darkness under the influences of his beautiful intellect and nature. That sublime hymn—The Memory of the Dead—pealing over the listening island through the gates of Trinity College, proclaims the revolution he silently achieved where poetry was sepulchred and national sentiments had never taken root.

The nationalization of every institution in the country—church and barrack, club-house and convent, the blacksmith's forge as well as the artist's shop—was the passionate labor of his life. He was no brainless leveller. In the loftiest sense, he was a reformer. He would educate to be free. The virtues that ennoble a revolution, restraining its excesses and compensating for many of its calamities, he would cultivate beforehand, so that the nation might have hardihood in its struggle, moderation in the hour of triumph, wisdom and frugality in the enjoyment of good fortune. He knew the prejudices against her freedom which existed amongst the higher classes, the lords of the soil, the learned professions, the dignitaries and devotees of the Protestant church. These he labored to remove, so that in their stead sentiments of nationality might steadily grow up, interweaving the more recent with the older races in one strong brotherhood.

It was not a convulsion, but a genial growth, he desired. Nations that leap suddenly from bondage into liberty are apt, he feared, to recede as violently as they advance. He preferred discipline, sobriety, and decision, to the precipitancy of enthusiasm. Patiently but surely he would have Ireland reach the destiny which towered above her in the future.

With these views, he proposed the formation of the '82 Club. Perpetuating the recollections of a splendid epoch, he desired that it should be the means of reviving the eloquence, the scholarship, the military spirit, the proud love of Ireland, which, expressing itself in the arms and resolutions of the Volunteers, dignified society, and gave to the Irish Parliament, freed from foreign checks, a stately supremacy on the soil. His own words best describe the origin of the Club, and the work he designed it to accomplish.

In the Nation of January 18th, 1845, he wrote:

"The prospectus of the National Club having been issued, we hasten to put our readers in possession of the facts; and we may incidentally observe, that both in England and Ireland the first intimation of the intention of the leading men of the movement to establish a body whose memories should be those of '82, whose principles should be those of the distinguished men of that day, and whose rallying cry and charter-toast should be, 'The Legislative Independence of Ireland,' was received with evident sympathy or alarm.

"It certainly is a noticeable movement—one that will aid, assist and encourage the popular party—that will be a centre of attraction to the young men throughout all Ireland—that will bring within its circle the intelligence, rank and wealth of the Repeal body; and will yet form a point of junction between the extreme Protestants and their Catholic countrymen. It is observable that of the five Vice-Presidents three of them are Protestants, and of the three Secretaries one is a Protestant. Several of the most active in working out the organization of the Club are Protestants. We state these facts to justify our assertion, that the principles of the Eighty-two Club will be of the most liberal description—that the requisites looked to in its members are liberality to men of all creeds, enlightened patriotism, and the adoption and advocacy of National opinions.

"The resolution embodying the Club was to the following effect:—'That the object of the Club is to facilitate the Repeal of the Union—to secure the establishment of the Legislative Independence of Ireland; and, as a means for the attainment of those ends, to encourage Irish Manufactures, Art, and Literature, and to diffuse through society a national feeling.'

"This resolution was moved—and who was fitter for the honor?—Henry Grattan.

"It was determined that the Club should dine together on the anniversary of the Declaration of Independence in 1782, and on other annversaries of other great events of Irish history. The members will wear a uniform of native green—give an annual ball—and encourage in every way by their presence and active patronage every institution for the advancement of Irish Literature, Art, and Manufacture. It is unnecessary to point out the wide field of active and generous patriotism thus opened to the wealth and intelligence of Irishmen.

"We have heretofore been so false to our country, so corrupted and poisoned by English influence, English literature, English modes of thought, that we owe her (our Native Land) a debt which we must hasten to pay her.

"This Club will enable us to do something towards this end. It will enable us to encourage books on Ireland by Irishmen, Irish History, Irish Poetry, Irish Antiquities; in its meetings the speakers will use illustrations derived from the great eras of our history; they will provide for their visitors Irish music; they will encourage Irish, as distinct from the base and servile doctrines which some men disgracing their country are fond of preaching; they will enforce doctrines of enlightened liberality; they will be intolerant only of bigotry and servility.

"Every rank in the state is represented on this Committee. Every profession has its representative. The Municipalities, in the persons of Messrs. Dowden, Geary, Cane, Campbell, Bianconi, McLoughlin, and Sir Benjamin Morris, have given their sanction to the new Club. There are nine members of the Legislature; and there is one man on the Committee who will shortly enter the House of Commons, as representative of one of the greatest counties, and who, himself, if we mistake not, would consider one of the greatest claims to an Irish county was being a member of the Volunteers of '45. We allude to Richard Albert Fitzgerald.

"The provincial press of Ireland has spoken of the Club as one of the most promising steps we have as yet taken. We shall give the articles they publish on the subject from time to time, and shall commence with the following excellent observations of the Waterford Chronicle:

"'The new year has opened with bright promises and bright hopes. A late meeting of the association conveyed these promises and these hopes.

"'The impassioned eloquence of MacNevin; deep as the lake, yet sparkling as the stream; the statesmanlike intelligence of Wm. Smith O'Brien; the manly vigor of O'Hea; all concurred upon that day to elevate the character, to propagate, still farther, the fame of that great association. Combined with fresh ardor, new faculties, new powers appeared to operate. Hope seemed to rise, and not to languish, at the prospect of further toil, and still more extended sacrifices.

"'Another circumstance has tended to confirm this spirit—the formation of the '82 Club. Recalling the glories of a great era—an era when Ireland had not only her own orators, but her soldiery, to protect the privileges she had resumed—an era when (to use the language of our own illustrious poet) the Irish Parliament, in the very grave of its corruption, for the first time heard the voice of liberty, saying, 'Come forth;' and the same warning voice say to England, 'Loose him and let him go;' recalling the glories of this great era, the '82 Club, even in its birth, has lit a fire in the heart of the country, which no foul hand will find itself bold, or strong enough, ever to extinguish.

"'The formation of this club proves to the people that their leaders are right in earnest; and it will exhibit to Europe the high spirit that predominates amongst the educated gentlemen of Ireland—amongst the O'Connell's, the Frenches, the O'Briens, the Talbots, the Grattans, the O'Loghlens, the Roches, and the Blakes.

"'This club, thank God! will break down the last hope of the Whig factionists in Ireland; and convince them, that whilst for the hireling and the party-serf the country has been lost, for the people it will be nobly regained.

"'In its enlightened operation it will nationalise our festivities, revive our music, our poetry, and the arts; it will create a national drama, and in every way propagate the bold spirit, and exalt the glowing genius of the New Nation.'"

A dinner given to O'Connell in St. John's Catholic Church, Kilkenny, was the first occasion on which the uniform of the Club appeared before the public. William Smith O'Brien, Dr. Cane, Robert Dillon Browne, John O'Connell, Dan Smithwick, Richard Barrett, Tom Steele, T. M. Ray, Secretary of the Repeal Association, and Edward Clements, the law adviser of the body, wore it. Appealing to the martial spirit of the people, reminding them of the days when it was death to wear the green, confirming hopes which warlike songs and defiant speeches had some time back excited, it was greeted with enthusiasm.

Smith O'Brien, returning thanks that evening for the mention of his name in connection with the Club, said—

"I confess I shall be very much disappointed if 500 men wearing the uniform do not before the close of the summer attend the debate in Conciliation Hall. I believe that the appearance of the national color gives heart to the people of Ireland—a heart which reminds them that they have a country to save, and that the color of that country is the immortal green. It has been suggested that our dress is somewhat military. I am not sorry that it suggests that remark. I am not sorry that the government should feel that the dress we wear wants nothing but the sword to constitute us officers of the Irish people. I believe it to be a salutary feeling on the part of all governments that they should remember that the ultimate redress for all national wrong is the sword."

Uttering these words, he touched a chord which broke, as it were, into a ringing peal of trumpets. The officers of a National Army stood before the people. Had the people been called to arms by the voice they trusted, in a few hours three provinces of the four would have been converted into camps.

The first meeting of the Club will form a chapter of pleasant gossip next week.

ILLUSTRIOUS IRISHMEN ABROAD.

(Translated from the Biographie Universelle.)

Count Alexander O'Reilly, a general in the Spanish service, was born in Ireland about the year 1735. He joined the Spanish army when very young, and was appointed sub-lieutenant in the Irish Regiment. He was engaged in Italy, in the war for the Austrian succession, and received a wound which rendered him partially lame for the remainder of his life. In 1757, he joined the Austrian army, and served during two campaigns against the Prussians, under the command of his countryman, Lascy (now Lacy). In 1759, he passed into the French army, and there so distinguished himself, that the Marshal de Broglie, on his return to Spain, recommended him to his sovereign, the Spanish monarch. This recommendation procured him the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In this quality he served in the inglorious war of Portugal, which was occupied at this time by the English. He had frequent opportunities, however, for distinguishing himself, at the head of a body of light troops, with the command of which he was entrusted. O'Reilly had already acquired the reputation of being one of the best officers in the Spanish army. He was promoted to the rank of Brigadier of the king's forces and Adjutant-major of drill—a post which was created for him especially. In the exercise of these functions, he trained the Spanish infantry to the German mode of drill. After the peace, he was made Lieutenant-General, and appointed second in command of the Havana, which had been restored to Spain by the treaty of Fontainbleau. He repaired the fortifications of this colony, and returned to Spain. The king appointed him Inspector-General of the infantry, and took great pleasure in witnessing the manœuvres of a camp of which he gave him the sole command. He next sent him to New-Orleans, whose inhabitants were growing restive under Spanish rule. The harsh measures O'Reilly was obliged to adopt in order to bring them under salutary control, procured him many enemies. He returned to Spain once more, and was constantly sustained by the favor of Charles the Third, who fully appreciated his brilliant parts, and could never forget his obligations to one who had saved his life during the insurrection of Madrid, in 1765. His popularity also increased to a very high degree, inasmuch as he gave a new impulse to the Spanish army, which had been for a long time inferior to those of the other nations of Europe. In 1774, he received the command of the expedition to Algiers. The grand divisions of the attack were intrusted to him; and he set sail with a squadron of forty ships of the line and three hundred and fifty transports, which carried an army of thirty thousand men. But this immense force did not land at the same time; for not receiving the flat-boats which had been prepared to disembark all the troops at once, O'Reilly, apprehensive of seeing his fleet run ashore, after fifteen days' delay, was at last obliged to land a body of six thousand men, commanded by the Marquis de la Romana. He had express orders to take up a position on shore, in order to protect the landing of the main army; but, carried away by the ardor of the troops, he advanced until he encountered the enemy, who were far more numerous, and were strongly intrenched behind hedges of cochineal and fig-trees. The Spanish troops fought with great bravery; they lost four thousand men, and their commander, Romana, was taken prisoner. Meantime the remainder of the army effected a landing, but this first check prevented them from following out the enterprise as they had intended. They were obliged to re-embark, and General O'Reilly—who had conceived the plan of action, of which all the military men of the day expressed their approval, but was unable to put it in execution, and who exhibited such dauntless bravery throughout, having two horses shot under him—was now reduced to the sorrowful necessity of returning to Spain with his army. He landed his force at Barcelona, on the 24th of August of the same year. This mischance detracted much from his great reputation, but took nothing from the favor of the king. He placed him at the head of a military school, established first at Avila, then at Port-Saint-Marie.

When O'Reilly was appointed Commander-General of Andalusia and Governor of Cadiz, he displayed the capacity of a great founder and skilful administrator; but he fell into complete disgrace at the death of Charles the Third, on the 14th of December, 1788, and lived in retirement at his seat in Catalonia. However, in spite of reverses, he always preserved his reputation with the Spanish army; and after the death of General Ricordos, in 1794, they saw no one who could better than O'Reilly direct the war against the French. He was accordingly appointed to the command of the Army of the Eastern Pyranees, but while he was on his way thither, he died very suddenly, at an advanced age. The reverses which Count de la Union afterwards experienced, caused him to be extremely regretted. However it is doubtful whether O'Reilly would have been more successful. His advanced age did not permit him to any longer bear the weight of such active service; and although he had been the master and teacher of the best officers of the Spanish Army, he had many enemies whom his utmost address, his mild and affable pliability of character, failed to conciliate.

Count Andrew O'Reilly, a general of cavalry in the service of Austria, was born in Ireland in the year 1740. He entered the army of the Empress Maria Theresa, when very young; distinguished himself during the Seven Years' War, and later, in the reign of Joseph the Second, in the war against the Turks. His valor and military talents procured him rapid promotion. He attained the rank of Major, and in this capacity took part in the first hostilities which ushered in the French Revolution. For his brilliant conduct at Marchiemus on the 31st October, 1793, he was appointed a general officer; at the battles of Amberg and Ulm, which took place respectively on the 23d of August and 24th September, he acquired further distinction. When the French army, commanded by Moreau, crossed the Rhine, opposite Kehl, on the 20th of April, 1797, the skilful manœuvres of O'Reilly, who commanded the rear, failed to prevent the defeat of the Austrians. He was wounded and taken, but, on an interchange of prisoners, was shortly afterwards restored, when he resumed his command in the interior. In 1805, we meet him again at the battle of Austerlitz, where, by his brilliant cavalry charges, he was mainly instrumental in saving the army of Francis from total destruction. The war having recommenced in 1809, he fought under the Archduke Maximilian, and when that prince was forced to abandon the defence of Vienna, attacked by overwhelming forces, O'Reilly was appointed governor of the city. After having sustained the bombardment for some time judging that a longer resistance would be attended by the most fatal consequences, and that the Austrian capital was menaced with destruction, at the final summons he ordered the garrison to cease firing. The Mayor, at the head of a deputation of the citizens, presented himself before Napoleon, and the capitulation forthwith took place. The Emperor of the French justly blamed the conduct of Maximilian, and bestowed the highest encomiums on O'Reilly. In the fourteenth article of the surrender, it was stipulated that he might betake himself to his sovereign, and inform him of the true state of the Austrian monarchy at this time. O'Reilly, who was already old and feeble, took no part in the subsequent wars. He died at Vienna in 1832, aged ninety-two years, with the rank of Field Marshal and Commander of the Order of Maria Theresa.

D. R. O'Reilly, Member of the Academy of Boulogne, of the Athenæum of Arts, Paris, and of many other learned societies, was descended from an Irish family. After having followed a military life for some time, he became a manufacturer, and applied himself especially to the study of industrial products. In 1800 he established at Paris a journal devoted to Technology, entitled Annales des Arts et Manufactures, on which he labored until his death, which took place in 1806. His partner was M. Barbier de Vemars, who continued the publication of the journal. Besides the numerous articles inserted therein, O'Reilly published "An Essay on Bleaching, with the Description of a New Method by means of Vapor, and its Application to the Arts." This was reviewed by Chaptal (Paris, 1801, octav. with 14 plates; a second edition, augmented, 1802). It also received honorable mention in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences, and in those of the Institute, and has been translated into German by C. G. Eschenbach, Leipzig, 1801, octavo, and by F. W. Fries, at Berne, in 1802.

ANOTHER O'REILLY,

Whom Barbier, in his Dictionaire des Anonymes, confounds with the former, settled in France, and established himself as a teacher of the English language at Paris. He published a Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language (Paris, 1756), and a comedy in two acts, entitled "The Happy Divorce" (1767).

NEWPORT.

LINES WRITTEN ON THE BEACH, BY A LITTLE COVE.

Here where the waves roll to the strand,
And Beaux and Belles go hand in hand
Into the water;
'Tis sweet to strengthen life and limb,
And with a sea-nymph take a swim,
Should you have caught her.

With salt, they say, you'll catch a bird—
To catch a sea-nymph, on my word,
When you're at Newport,
You've only got to bait your hook
With something of a "flashy" look—
You'll find it true sport.

And look you now, that gallant Swell
Comes here to woo this handsome Belle.
And 'sooth, he'll get her;
For here she waits with all her charms,
Ready to sink into his arms
Whene'er he'll let her.

I do not say, 'tis false pretence,
Nor do I blame his impudence
For this his wooing;—
What tho' he is a mere upstart?
His dashing way has won her heart
To her undoing.

The girls all know he has the rocks,
And think his being in the stocks
A Fancy feature;
The rogue, no doubt, is quite in state
To leave the Banks, and take for freight
The fairest creature.

What do these fair ones give away?
Their hearts' affections—so they say;
O bliss seraphic!
But what a fate, to say the least,
When Beauty only takes the Beast
In monied traffic!

'Tis not the girls just out of school,
But those who know how fashions rule,
That make this barter;—
Then why is there the least surprise,
When soon they find with open eyes,
They've caught a Tar-tar?

I do not mean a sailor Tar—
They seldom ride in Fashion's car,
With silver harness;—
But 'tis that rude and vulgar kind
That manners little have refined
And money far less.

Then vive success, and bagatelle!
Go on, my great and gallant swell,
Go in and win her;
While I'll be off to the Hotel,
And quietly go court the Bell,
That sounds for Dinner.

COPYRIGHT IN GERMANY.—The subdivision to infinity of the German States makes itself felt in everything, but most especially in questions involving literary property. The United Publishers' Association of Germany some time since memorialized the Government of Saxony upon this subject. It is particularly in relation to the works of dead authors that there are enormous differences in the laws of the various States. In Austria the right is prorogued to the 19th October, 1856; in Prussia, to 11th June, 1867; in Brunswick, to 1st Jan., 1872; in Saxony, to 22d Feb., 1874. In some States there is no date fixed, and the publishers do not know how to act. The convention of the 19th June, 1837, provided that all works that had appeared previous to that year should be protected till 1867. That was reasonable, since the principle of property in literature is so generally recognized at the present day; it should be systematically regulated, that publishers and authors might not live in so much uncertainty.—Athénæum Francais.

THE DELIGHTS OF PATRIOTISM.

A young lawyer writes us a pretty long letter from Federal street, Boston, giving us a few of his pleasanter experiences in professional life. The learned gentleman was somewhat conspicuously mixed up with the political affairs of Ireland, eight or nine years ago. His experiences, in an amusing way illustrate the penalties attached to a political position of the slightest celebrity. In their difficulties, several of his countrymen have called upon him, and, relying on his "patriotism," solicit his gratuitous advice. One of the many letters addressed to him in this spirit, reminds him of the fact of his being "a patriarch," and his having followed "in the footsteps of Emmet."

A week or ten days before the feast of St. Patrick, a morose-looking and lanky-limbed client, with a green shade over his eyes, entered the office in Federal street. There was a child, like a bundle of cobwebs, in one arm. A fiddle, in a green baize bag, lay snugly tucked under the other. The client was a fiddler from Tullamore, King's County. He knew Father O'Rafferty, the parish priest of the place, and had travelled up one time in the canal-boat to Dublin in company with Father Tom Maguire and Tom Steele; he was now on the broad of his back; couldn't scrape a sixpence in coppers together; and the child in his arms was just out of the measles. A dollar would give him a lift.

That case disposed of, a very fat man, with gray head, placid face, and big hands, walked in. He was neatly shaved, and carried a dark-colored pocket-handkerchief in the same hand with his hat. His dress was respectable, but had evidently suffered much from length of service and the use of the brush. A blue dress-coat, studded in a desultory way with brass buttons; brown trowsers, very baggy all round from the waist to the thighs, but scanty from the knees to the ankles; shawl-pattern double-breasted waistcoat; white cotton stockings; shoes, cut for corns, recently polished; a spongy, yellowish glove on the left hand, with the tops of the thumb and two of the fingers devoured; this was his costume. His voice was mellow, and his eyes benevolent. He was a butler in search of a place. Born in Kilcullen, Co. Kildare, he was brought up in Dublin. His father had been for ever so many years head-waiter at the Bilton, in Sackville street. He himself had lived with Judge Burton, Town-Major White, Sir Philip Crampton, and the Batchelors out near Baldoyle. He was now close upon sixty. At home, the family and neighbors celebrated his birth on Michaelmas Day. Had he been a Tory or a mean-spirited spalpeen, he needn't have left Ireland. But when Mr. Smith O'Brien took the field, he took the Nation and John Mitchel's paper, and that was the destruction of him. At that time he had the misfortune to be with Sir Philip Crampton. The lock of an old horse-pistol, which Sir Philip discovered in a drawer in the pantry, amongst a heap of candle-ends and worn-down shoe-brushes, finished him clean. That night (it was the night Mr. Duffy tried to make his escape from Newgate) Sir Philip discharged him. The written discharge the old Baronet gave him was as bad as a death-warrant.

"Sorra one of the gentry," said the butler, "would have me on seeing it. I might as well have been in the Hue-and-Cry. It disordered my family arrangements completely. I had to leave Ireland with the rest of the exiles. I came first to Quebec, and then to Portland, in Maine. In Portland I was offered a fine situation in an ice-cream saloon opposite the Town Hall. But that didn't agree with me, for I'm subject to stomach-complaints. So I thought I'd try my luck in Boston. After searching about ever so long for something to do, I got an engagement at the Opera. They put me to light fires in the Green-room and dressing-rooms. I took cowld at the work. They packed me off to the Hospital with a lame foot and the wart you see on my nose, where the Doctor bled me for an inflammation of the lungs. When I was well enough to get on my legs (the corns trouble me still) I was hired by Judge Bailey, who lives close to the Glass Works, South Boston. If the Judge hadn't been a Know-Nothing, I might have remained with him until something better was heard of. But who could live with a Know-Nothing Judge, and he damning the Pope and the Irish servant-girls from morning till night? The Judge used to swear the poor girls were Jesuits in disguise. I couldn't stand this. I sent him due notice to quit, and gave him fair warning I'd stump Massachusetts against him when he'd run for Governor, which Mr. Mick Gowan, the naturalization agent, informed me was his intention next Fall. After this I put on my hat, and walked out, a free and independent man, to ease my mind on the Common. I couldn't think of anything. My mind was all astray, though I was perfectly content. I took out my naturalization papers next day. Mr. Mick Gowan, when he handed them to me, recommended your honor as one who would be sure to see after me, and that's why I called."

The butler was ready to serve more notices, if the young lawyer of Federal street would engage him; or he could dust his books and keep his letters and papers in order. He wouldn't mind running of messages either, if his corns would let him. If not, he thought of emigrating to St. Paul's, Minnesota, and would feel obliged for a line of introduction to General Shields. Once there, he could start a paper in favor of Fremont. The learned and patriotic gentleman of Federal street disposed of this case with a donation of two quarters, and many assurances of esteem and good-will.

The third case communicated to us is of common occurrence. An Irishwoman, married to a French manufacturer of bird-cages, appears to have been, for the last three years, at war with a Dutch laundress who lived opposite her, in a narrow lane contiguous to the Lowell railway depôt. From words, mutually unintelligible, it came to blows. The Irishwoman appeared the following morning at the law-office, at the desk of which the expatriated butler so successfully pleaded his case, and rolled out a long catalogue of wrongs. The Dutch laundress had beaten her. A brown scar on her forehead (as if a large spider had been flattened out there) was evidence of that. In further proof of her statement, she turned down her apron (she sat all the while) and counted out several broken pieces of crockery-ware—vestiges of water-jugs and tea-cups with which she had been assaulted. Mrs. Cuddihy (for that was the poor creature's name) wanted to know if a patriot like young Mr. Mooney (for that was his name) couldn't help a poor widow. She told him she had seen him the day Mr. O'Connell was let out of prison, and that her husband had voted for his (the young lawyer's) uncle the time he stood for Dundalk. More than this. She knew the Widow McCormac's house, and could show her Repeal card. She wanted to know, if, after all this, Mrs. Thunderhoorn wouldn't be made to pay? Mr. Mooney, in reply, gave Mrs. Cuddihy, the widow, some temperate advice; and having dwelt fully on the evils of gin, bowed her with the sweetest of smiles to the door. At the foot of the stairs, Mrs. Mooney turned round and looked up:

"And that's the way you thrate me. Bad cess to you for disturbing the peace of the country, you infidel robber," says she.

HISTORY OF IMMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES, &c. By WILLIAM J. BROMWELL, of the Department of State. Redfield.

This work is highly commendable, inasmuch as it is the first contribution to a branch of the history of the United States which is every day receiving vast importance. The future American Sismondi and Thierry who will devote their great capacity and mayhap grow blind in philosophic self-sacrifice, tracing up the various life-streams which poured their vitality and power into the channel from which emerged to greatness and perpetuity the modern race known as the American, will highly honor the compiler of the present work, and largely rely upon its statements. It is an undertaking of serious labor and very considerable success. We regret however, that owing to the carelessness of "collectors of customs," many returns of passengers are indefinitely headed "from Great Britain and Ireland," from "Europe," "Asia," &c., without stating the distinct nations or territories from which the passengers came, and which in almost every instance could have been ascertained at the time. This book shows the necessity for particularity on the point, and should suggest to the proper authorities the enforcement of positive clearness in the immigration statistics.

As regards the statistics of the immigration from Ireland and England, we doubt not but that very valuable particulars could be obtained through the leading shipping houses in Dublin, Liverpool, Cork, &c., and in the custom houses there. The nationalities of the passengers could be to a very serviceable degree accurately ascertained. It would of course demand patient labor; and we trust that the present work will receive sufficient encouragement as to warrant further achievements in the same line.

What we desire can be illustrated with a single fact. We learn here, that during a period of thirty-six and a quarter years ending on the last day of the past year, the total number of Immigrants to America from the "United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland" was 2,343,445. Now, the knowledge of this truth only makes us more anxious to know how many of the number were Irish, how many English, Scotch, or Welsh, and deeply mortified that we cannot with any satisfaction approach a solution of the question. It might be done, we think, in the manner and by the means we suggest.

To Mr. Bromwell, however, we must feel deeply indebted. A work of this nature could not be accomplished without having some defects. In the present case, the compiler had to use such statistics as he found; and it is not his fault if the details have not been apportioned as is most desirous.

In a comprehensive introduction, Mr. Bromwell reviews the partial labors of others who have gone before him in noting the occasional growth of the foreign-born population; and gives a summary of the chief information embraced in the volume. The whole has been collected from official documents;—Annual Reports on Immigration, Congressional communications, Passenger abstracts furnished to the Secretary of State by Collectors of Customs, Custom-House Records, &c. An appendix contains the naturalization and passenger laws, and extracts from the laws of several states relating to Immigrants, paupers, and such as are debarred from laboring for their own support. It is a good book for reference, and turned out by the publisher in readable fashion.

"COUSIN NICHOLAS" is the title of a highly amusing story, by the Rev. Mr. Barham, author of the well-known Ingoldsby Papers. The work is exceedingly pleasant reading for half an hour at a time, but is rather overdone to attract a fastidious reader to a consecutive perusal of its chapters. It is of that order of novel which Theodore Hook and his class were given to concoct, and is more remarkable for the persistency with which jokes are laboriously piled up than for the brilliancy of the material out of which they are concocted. "Cousin Nicholas," however, is full of natural touches, and humorously treats of the pranks and practical jokes of the only son of the House of Bulwinkle, or Bolevaincle, as the good-humored Sir Oviver spells the name of his great ancestor, Sir Roger. Young Nick is full of the mischief said to be inherent in the offspring of the old gentleman of the same name, and his adventures are detailed with great ease and pleasantry. Like good wine, the book, however, must be taken in sips to obtain its full flavor. It is published by A. Burke, Buffalo.

HUMBOLDT'S ESSAY ON CUBA—THE AMERICAN TRANSLATION.

Baron von Humboldt has caused an article to be inserted in the Spenersche Zeitung, the pith of which is embraced in the following extracts:

"Under the title of Essai Politique sur l'Isle de Cuba, published in Paris in 1826, I collected together all that the large edition of my Voyage aux Régions Equinoxiales du Nouveau Continent contained upon the state of Agriculture and Slavery in the Antilles. There appeared at the same time an English and a Spanish translation of this work, the latter entitled Ensayo

Politico sobre la Isla de Cuba, neither of which omitted any of the frank and open remarks which feelings of humanity had inspired. But there appears just now, strangely enough, translated from the Spanish translation, and not from the French original, and published by Derby & Jackson, in New-York, an octavo volume of 400 pages, under the title of The Island of Cuba, by Alexander Humboldt; with Notes and a Preliminary Essay, by J. S. Thrasher. The translator, who has lived a long time on that beautiful island, has enriched my work by more recent data on the subject of the numerical standing of the population, of the cultivation of the soil, and the state of trade, and, generally speaking, exhibited a charitable moderation in his discussion of conflicting opinions." Humboldt complains that the seventh chapter of the Spanish translation, with which his Essai Politique ended, has been "arbitrarily omitted. To this very portion of my work," he says, "I attach greater importance than to any astronomical observations, experiments of magnetic intensity, or statistical statements. A steady advocate as I am for the most unfettered expression of opinion in speech or in writing, I should never have thought of complaining if I had been attacked on account of my statements; but I do think I am entitled to demand that in the Free States of the continent of America, people should be allowed to read what has been permitted to circulate from the first year of its appearance in a Spanish translation. "Alexander Von Humboldt."

"Berlin, July, 1856."

Mr. J. S. Thrasher fearing that the readers of the above might infer he had wilfully mutilated the work of so great a writer, gives the following explanation to the Daily Times:—

Being desirous of placing in the hands of American readers such information in relation to the Island of Cuba as my studies had enabled me to obtain, I made the translation referred to, as being the best work I have ever seen on the subject. In undertaking this labor, I was not aware that any English version of the work had ever been made, and I used the Spanish edition for text, simply because, being ignorant of the French language, I could not translate the essay from that tongue.

As it was written thirty years ago, during which time the material development of Cuba had been very great, a continuance of Baron Humboldt's remarks became necessary, in order to bring the subject matter up to the present time, and this labor I have inserted in notes. In carrying out the design of a work on Cuba, I deemed that I could not take up the subject at a more appropriate point than that where the illustrious author had left it in 1825.

The chapter complained of as being omitted is a distinct essay "On Slavery," and is so entitled in the volume where it is published. Cuba is only incidentally alluded to in it, while it begins with this express declaration: "I here close the Examen, or Political Essay on Cuba, in which I have presented the state of this important Spanish possession as it at present exists." Baron Humboldt's complaint is not that I have mutilated his essay on Cuba, but that I have not published all the matter contained in the volume from which I have translated his work on that important island. I would add that no one entertains a higher or more sincere regard than I do for the great and venerable name of Baron Von Humboldt.

I would ask those journals that may have alluded to or published the article in question to publish also this letter. Very respectfully, yours, J. S. THRASHER.

Literary and Artistic News.

Thomas Crawford, the eminent American Sculptor, was in Richmond last week, and closed a contract with Governor Wise for the completion of the Washington Monument, by placing on the four vacant circular pedestals the statues of George Mason, the author of the Virginia Declaration of Rights in 1776, the first made in America: Chief Justice John Marshall; General Andrew Lewis, the hero of Point Pleasant; and General Thomas Nelson, of Yorktown, distinguished sons of Virginia. Thus, in the language of Governor Wise's eloquent Lexington oration:

"The monument may be an ideal of the colonial State in a Lewis; the Revolution in a Henry; of a written Constitution and a Bill of Rights in a Mason; of Independence in a Jefferson; of the ways and means and action of the Revolution in a Nelson; and of the adjustment of the times by a judiciary in a Marshall; and the whole be surmounted by the head of all, the crowning glory of all, in a Washington.

In consultation with Mr. Crawford, it was determined to ornament the six lower rectangular pedestals not with eagles as originally designed, but with trophies representing the peculiar characteristics of the men to whose statues these pedestals belong. The idea, all will admit, is appropriate and beautiful.

Mr. Crawford, (says the Richmond Enquirer, 12th inst.,) is now in Washington, whither he has sent some exquisite models, representing the progress of Civilization in America, for a pediment of the extension of the Capitol. Mr. Crawford will sail for Europe on the 25th September, to finish his works for Virginia and other places. It is proper that we should state that Mr. Crawford expressed the highest satisfaction with the beautiful and substantial style in which the granite structure of the monument, on our Capitol Square, has been completed. It is confidently expected that the Equestrian statue of Washington, now boxed up in Munich, will be brought over from Amsterdam during the autumn, by the United States steam propeller "Merrimack," Captain Pendergast. At Norfolk it will be placed upon a large ark and towed up to Richmond.

In a notice given, by a Neapolitan journal, of a performance which took place at the Royal Palace of the Caserta at Naples, on the 1st instant, before the King and royal family, we find the following mention made of Mr. F. Glover, son of Professor Glover of Dublin:—"The young Irishman, Ferdinando Glover, particularly distinguished himself in the duet from "Gabriella di Vergi," sung with La Signora Sbriglia, and in the trio from "Ernani," with Signora Sbriglia and Signor Martinella. He received immense applause and was greeted with clamorous evvivi in the "Romanza del Furioso," which he sang with all the expression which so difficult, and, at the same time, so beautiful a composition demanded. We had already heard Signor Glover in many private societies in this city, where his fine voice and artistic style gave much delight, but we now congratulate him heartily on the success of this public proof of his abilities."

Putnam is issuing a new edition of Commander Wilke's Narrative of the United States Exploring Expedition during the years 1838–9–40–41–42, in five volumes with thirteen maps. This work increases in value as our commerce with the Pacific increases, and as a record of the first naval exploring expedition undertaken by our government, possesses a political and historical, as well as a literary and commercial interest.

Parke Godwin's "Political and other Essays," are announced by Dix, Edwards & Co. Several of the papers to be included in the collection, are already known to the readers of Putnam's Monthly. Mr. Godwin, is a bold, vigorous writer and thinker, and if his readers do not agree with any, or all of the theories he propounds and illustrates, they always find his style comprehensive, manly, and refreshing. He is the author of a fine article on Shelley, published in the Democratic Review, some years since.

The late Sharon Turner, author of the "History of the Anglo-Saxons," who received three hundred a year from Government as a literary pension, wrote the third volume of his "Sacred History of the World" upon paper which did not cost him a farthing. The copy consisted of torn and angular fragments of letters and notes; of covers of periodicals—grey, drab, or green—written in thick, round hand, over a small print; of shreds of curling paper, unctuous with pomatum or bear's grease; and of the white wrappers in which his proofs were sent from the printers. The paper, sometimes as thin as a bank-note, was written on both sides; and was so sodden with ink, plastered on with a pen worn to a stump, that hours were frequently wasted in discovering on which side of it certain sentences were written. Men condemned to work on it saw their dinner vanishing in illimitable perspective; and first-rate hands groaned over it a whole day for tenpence. One poor fellow assured the writer of this paper, that he could not earn enough upon it to pay his rent, and that he had seven mouths to fill besides his own. In the hope of mending matters in some degree, slips of stout white paper were sent frequently with the proofs; but the good gentleman could not afford to use them, and they never came back as copy.

There are, by the census, 355 publishers in the United States, 2000 booksellers, 15,000 printers, and 3,500 bookbinders. The number of new books issued in 1853 is said to have exceeded 1000. Only one book out of every 200 gets to a second edition.

Letter from Smith O'Brien.

Dromoland, July 29, 1856,

My Dear Sir:—I have for some time felt an anxious desire to offer my best acknowledgments to those members of the House of Commons, who, during the last and present session of Parliament, exerted themselves to procure my restoration to Ireland; but I have found some difficulty in determining what would be the most suitable mode of giving effect to this desire. It now seems to me that there can be no occasion more appropriate than the moment of my return to my native land; and as you were one of those who were most earnest in this endeavor, and have also command of a journal which will enable you to give publicity to my sentiments, I shall feel obliged if you will become the organ for conveying my thanks to those with whom you co-operated.

From the hour of my imprisonment until the present moment I have carefully abstained from soliciting any favor from the British Government, or any mitigation of the penalties which I incurred in 1848. Having done what I considered my duty, I could not express contrition. It therefore seemed to me becoming to remain entirely passive, and to submit without repining to the consequences of an attempt which may have been ill-judged, but which was prompted by the purest motives. At the same time, I have not felt myself bound to deprecate on the part of others the expression of sympathy which seemed to me to be highly honorable to those who entertained it—even though that sympathy was evinced in the form of solicitation.

As there has been little disposition to underrate the mental sufferings, privations and pecuniary losses which I and my family have sustained, I shall now speak only of the circumstances by which we have been consoled. It will always be to us a subject of pleasing and grateful recollection to remember that, from the hour of my conviction to the day of my return, my own countrymen, without distinction of classes, creeds or parties, have exhibited deep solicitude in my fate, and from time to time have manifested this solicitude in the manner which seemed to them most conducive to my deliverance from imprisonment and exile. Nor has this sympathy been confined to Ireland. Even in Van Diemen's Land, I experienced on the part of English and Scotch as well as of Irish colonists, the greatest possible kindness—kindness which I can never forget—whilst in Victoria and in New South Wales my liberation was greeted with such gratulations as are generally offered to those who triumph rather than to those who fail.

In the United States large multitudes of Americans assembled in their chief cities to solicit the intervention of the President of the Republic on behalf of the Irish State Prisoners, and our liberation from Van Diemen's Land in 1854 gave occasion to an address of congratulation from New-York, which appears to have embodied the sentiments of a great majority of the inhabitants of one of the largest capitals in the world.

I have been informed also that during the present Spring an address to the Queen (which I have not as yet seen) was carried by the Legislature of Canada by which my restoration to Ireland was earnestly requested.

In like manner I have experienced on the part of individuals devotion such as has been rarely equalled, of which I need cite no other instance than that of my friend, Mr. P. J. Smyth, who made two voyages round the world with a view to assist in rescuing me from captivity.

During the Session of 1855 I was apprised that one hundred and forty members of Parliament memorialised the Prime-Minister in favor of my unconditional return. Upon analising the the list of their names I discovered that it contained a majority of the Representatives of Ireland, among whom were to be found some who would have asked no other favor from a British Minister; and several whose views respecting the political interests of Ireland are diametrically opposed to those which I entertain, as well as others who have been in the habit of supporting the Whig administration. I found also in this list the names of some of the most distinguished of the English and Scotch members, amongst whom indiscriminately were men belonging to the several parties which divide the arena of political contention.

To all who have expressed or felt sympathy I would willingly tender my acknowledgments; and it is with this view that I now address to you this letter, in the hope that it may obtain extended publicity.

You will therefore oblige me by placing it upon public record in whatever manner may appear to you most acceptable to to those for whose perusal it is designed.

I remain, my dear sir,
Yours very sincerely,
J. F. Maguire, Esq., M. P. William S. O'Brien.

LETTER FROM NEWPORT.

SHELLS AND SEA-FLOWERS.

Newport, August 15th.

The season is at its height, and we girls are all here looking our best, "getting up" our complexions by taking "fogs," and the salt-sea waves, doing the hops and drives, and all other excitements; but the dear men won't admire, and, what is still worse, won't propose. Sad, sad, but, at the same time, most amusing, is the whole thing. The millionaires stand off at a most respectable distance. The clever and agreeable men preserve a most ominous silence. The elegant and accomplished are such "belles" that most of us are content with even a glance—and the dear little "working bees of society," as a brilliant and accomplished lady friend of ours terms the dancing herd, are as ineligible as ever. So there is no hope for us, but to find our happiness in some other more accessible, perhaps, but to the most of us, unknown and unexplored Utopia. However, some few do believe in "destiny," and take the present in a calm, placid, and "Townish" manner, and can give a dispassionate view of passing events in this great world at Newport in a way that may perhaps interest some of your numerous readers who, by uncontrollable circumstances, are prevented from giving their personal attention to the subject. You must fancy yourself on the beach, about ten o'clock in the morning, and promise not to laugh at the nondescript animals of the Zebra order who emerge from the little pens that so closely line the shore, and, advancing with a mixture of boldness and timidity, bow meekly to the surging waves. Another, whose beard betrays his sex, with determined look tucks his delicate offspring under his arm, and triumphantly carries the squirming, howling specimen to his daily drowning. Then a general scampering to each particular den, which they seem to recognise by instinct, and soon the attending coaches are slyly filled with the exhausted, and at the same time exhilarated devotees. They return to civilized lodgings and the amplitude of drawing-room toilettes, or perhaps doze over the "Martins of Cro' Martin," till the welcome dressing-bell summons them to the pet business of the day, when they get themselves "up" in all excruciating styles imaginable—ludicrous and inappropriate in some, and gracefully exaggerated in others—and fancy they enjoy their dinners. Perhaps they do. I was helped to some boiled chicken at the Ocean the other day, but it defied my utmost efforts. The charming Shanghai must have inhaled the strengthening air of this favored spot longer than I had. So I was convinced and vanquished at the same time. After several other unsuccessful attempts, I gave it up, and consoled myself with a turn or two in the hall, listening to the dulcet strains of some philanthropic musicians, while an enterprising gentleman friend gave me the latest gossip, &c. But you should have seen the "turn outs" that turned out shortly for the drive. Tandem teams, of which the leader seemed possessed to run towards the driver—melancholy young men on horseback, who seemed weighed down with the feeling of the uncertainty of ever reaching home in safety—and dangerously brave young females, who did not seem to think of anything but the fun of getting run away with by a horse, and run after by a man. Lots of slow old gentlemen, with red noses, followed by fat wives and vulgar daughters, filled the slow coaches, and slowly dragged their slow length along, to take the full benefit of the air, which by this time you could not find for the dust—Newport can be dusty when it makes the effort, I've been told. It would make you laugh to see them all pretend to enjoy it, and to be having such jolly times. Off they go to the beach, where, looking from the hills, the coaches seemed like so many crabs wriggling about; or to Bateman's, where every one rides to catch a glimpse of each other, instead of the glorious views so constantly bursting upon you at every turn. I am convinced half of them come back a little displeased with themselves for going so far and seeing so few of the dear people. The other day some foolhardy one of our party proposed we should take tea at the Glen. So away we went back in the country, past the Observatory and windmills, and everything else, till I was afraid we were past the Glen as well. I innocently asked the coachman how far we were off from that desired haven? "Only about four miles," said he. I was too discouraged to speak more, and resigned myself calmly to dust and jolts till we reached Mrs. Durfee's. Not a bit of a Glen to be seen, of course, unless we chose to drive the poor resigned beasts nearly a mile further. Compassion stepped in, and we stepped out, and soon had some hot coffee to console us, and a fine moon to light us home again; but I could not help thinking I should consider myself mad in any other place to do the same. Fashion is all-powerful—long may it reign! But the "hops,"—that's the cream of the joke. And what be-flounced and be-whaleboned specimens we all are, to be sure, when we make our appearance on the floor; and how well we dance, and how good the music is, and how handsome Brignoli looked at the "Filmore" the other evening. We all agree about him, you know. By the way, the "Filmore" is patronised by the Ton—(they say the "Ocean" is by the Tin)—this summer in a way that compels all to give it the palm. Several American ladies that are blest with the title of "Madame" benignantly smile through the din of the room, and receive the solicitations and adulations of the nodding, bobbing and hopping crowd. How superbly beatiful was the fair representative from New-Orleans that evening, and what a stunning dress she wore! She has evidently been a belle ever since she opened those soft, brown eyes. She should be called the Duchess of Louisiana. Our Northern belle, from the Genesee Valley, how immensely she enlarges the reputation her beautiful mother made by her manifold attractions. There are lots of minor belles here who deserve the fame of the heroines of old, both in personal and mental attractions, and would have it too, only there are so many of us. The celebrities who are here ring their own changes, so I will pass them by in silent admiration; but you can scarcely number them. Politics I know nothing about, except that I am a Buchaneer, and so is every one else I meet. I am very tired; good night. Excuse the very Oriental style of your fair friend,

Dinner-Bell.

American News.

The Jefferson City (Mo.) Inquirer says that Joseph Hoover, a guard at the penitentiary has been arrested and placed in jail to await his trial for attempting to liberate Robert McO'Blenis and four other persons confined in the prison. He proposed to O'Blenis that if he would give him $150, and his obligation for $5,000, to be paid after his liberation, he would have a horse and a change of clothing in readiness, and pass him out by way of the guard-house, for which purpose he had a rope-ladder prepared, and place him in safety ten miles from the city. O'Blenis, it seems, informed the Warden of the circumstances, and a watch was concealed in the cell occupied by O'Brien, and when Hoover made his appearance to complete the necessary arrangements with O'Blennis, and to receive the money (which had previously been placed in the hands of O'Blenis), Hoover was secured, and will, no doubt, be sent to the penitentiary as a convict.

Dr. Jackson, of Boston, has been making investigations in regard to the seed of the cotton plant. His researches, it is said, show that the seed may be profitably employed in the production of oil, whilst the refuse fibre adhering to the seeds may be used in the manufacture of paper. It is stated that the yield of oils from the unprepared seed is small compared with that from seeds which have been hulled.

The crops of New Jersey, as far as gathered, are said to be unusually large. Those standing are suffering from drought. The wheat, rye, and hay crops are considerably larger than last year, and the recent fine weather has been of great benefit in gathering them.

Mr. COLLAMER, read the minority report in favor of the House bill; tabled, by 35 against 12. The Civil Appropriation bill was considered, and after debate the House proviso, prohibiting military superintendency in the erection of public buildings, was stricken out. An amendment was adopted, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase three stores at the Atlantic Docks, Brooklyn.

The Secretary of the Treasury was called upon for a mass of information affecting the interests of different sections of the country in connection with the Tariff, looking to the enlargement of the free list, &c. A message was received from the President vetoing the Des Moines Rapids bill, but the House re-passed the bill over the veto. The Post Office Appropriation bill passed. The Army bill, returned from the Senate without Mr. Sherman's proviso, was then taken up, and Mr. Pennington suggested a substitute, to avoid all constitutional scruples, which was adopted, and returned to the Senate.

The House (in Committee) adhered to its former action, refusing to pay the Kansas Legislature and Judiciary, unless the treason prosecutions were abandoned.

August 14.—A communication was received from the Postmaster General in reference to the abstraction of documents, &c., from the mails. The amendments to the Legislative, Judicial and Executive Appropriation bill were concurred in. The bill establishing a large number of post routes passed. August 15.—The Senate bill regulating Consular and Diplomatic Salaries, passed; also a bill giving $200,000 to establish a Naval Depot at Brunswick, Ga. The Senate bill regulating the pay of Members of Congress, was taken up, amended and passed by three majority. The usual extra compensation to employees of the House was voted. BUCHANAN AND THE PRESS.

Mr. Ashbury Hull, who was a Whig elector in Georgia in 1848, now declares for Buchanan and Breckinridge on these grounds: "The contest in the coming Presidential election must, it appears to me, be narrowed down between the Black Republicans and the Democrats. In that condition of affairs can any Southern man hesitate? I cannot. The principles avowed by the Democratic party are certainly, to my mind, more favorable to the great interest which Southerners regard of more importance to our well-being than the principles of the party or parties antagonistic; and, therefore, with the lights before me, and discarding party ties and prejudices, I think I shall best discharge my duty in voting for Buchanan and Breckinridge."—Cincinnati Gazette.

The Day Book says, George Law has written another long letter, full of bad grammar and pitiful ignorance, in favor of Fremont as President. George expects some fat contracts if Fremont be elected, but he ought to have sense enough not to show his ignorance by writing letters on political topics.

Benjamin F. Hallett, who reported and was probably the author of the Cincinnati platform, is one of the most notorious Abolitionists in Massachusetts. He was also the author of the celebrated Buffalo resolutions, adopted by the federal party in 1848, and about that time said that "Hell was too comfortable a place for a slaveholder." He seems to be a professional platform maker, and fills them up to order, giving them either a pro-slavery, an anti-slavery, or a non committal aspect, as the circumstances and peculiar party trickery may require.—Louisvi 'e Journal.

A more contemptible falsehood than this never was penned. The editor will next affirm, that Gen. Cass or Stephen A. Douglass wrote the Buffalo platform, and swore that "Hell was too comfortable a place for a slaveholder!" B. F. Hallett was Chairman of the Committee of Resolutions at the Democratic Convention at Baltimore in 1848, and wrote the resolutions passed on that occasion; and was a firm and unflinching, and powerful supporter of General Cass. He was appointed a member of the Democratic National Committee, and has been a member of that body ever since. As such he called the Convention to order in 1852. He is the man cursed night and morning, by all the Abolitionists of the East, and especially of Massachusetts, for his action in behalf of the claimant of Burns, the fugitive slave. One of the most eloquent and powerful speeches made last year against the Abolitionists, was made by B. F. Hallet. He has not been in Congress; otherwise there is not a more notorious anti-Abolitionist in the Union, than B. F. Hallett. The assertion that he had anything to do with the Buffalo platform, except to oppose it, and the party who made it, with all his power, is a lie—nothing but a lie. If ignorantly told, it shows a degree of ignorance not often met with.—Louisville Democrat.

There are few names better known (says the Cincinnati Gazette) to the Whigs of Ohio, and more generally respected, than that of Nelson Barrere, of Hillsborough, in this State. His excellent attainments, amiable character, and warm devotion to the principles of Clay and Webster, gave him great consideration with that organization. He was the Scott-Whig candidate for Congress in 1852 in the Highland District, and was the last Whig candidate for Governor, in 1853, and was supported for that office by the State Journal and Cincinnati Gazette.

Like most of the Old-Line Whig patriots, Nelson Barrere is now found in the ranks of the Union Democratic party. He made a speech at a late Democratic meeting in Hillsborough, the substance of which is given in the Hillsborough Gazette:

"He declared that he saw no hope for the country but in the success of the Democratic party, and, for his part, he intended to vote with it. He also exposed the huckstering, jobbing manner in which Fremont, through the brokers, bankers, and swindlers of Wall street, New-York, has secured the Republican nomination, and denounced it as more scandalous, abject, and vile than ever was the sale of the Roman crown by the Prætorian Guards. These Wall-street brokers, he said, had degraded the dignity of the highest and most sacred office known to the American people, and brought it under the auctioneer's hammer. Besides the other momentous questions of this contest, there was a question as to whether the Wall-street brokers should govern the people or the people govern themselves. For his part he believed in the people governing themselves. He was unwilling to see the Government transferred from Washington to Wall street, where the rulers—Law, Grinnell & Co.—cared nothing for the people, if they could have their lines of steamships from New-York to California, and from California to China and Japan, and have 'Uncle Sam' to 'foot the bill.'

"Mr. Barrere also discussed, at considerable length, the slavery question, as now presented before the people, and proved disunion to be the inevitable tendency and result of the present Black-Republican policy. He also showed up the hypocrisy of their denial of any treacherous intentions; the manner in which they had perverted the doctrines of Jefferson and the early fathers; and how false and hollow their pretences that they sought to bring the Government back to that policy."

The Mobile Register: writes, as an evidence, not merely of the increasing interest now felt in England in American politics, but of the better appreciation of them that now obtains among well informed men:

We give below an interesting notice of Mr. Buchanan, from the London Globe.

The views expressed, though not perhaps accurate in every particular, are, upon the whole, just; and coming from the source they do, are worthy of attention as indicating the probable effect of Mr. Buchanan's election upon public sentiment in England in reference to the relations between the United States and that country.

The writer says truly that Mr. Buchanan is known the world over; he might, with equal truth, have added, that wherever he is known, his reputation is that of a wise, prudent and sagacious statesman.

The English writer has correctly appreciated Mr. Buchanan. He is a STATESMAN—in every sense entitled to the name. Politics with him has not been a game to be played, but a science to be studied, and having abundant leisure and ample means he has devoted himself to it as a work of love and duty. His career has been eminently marked by that cautious progress which should distinguish a great mind grappling with the difficulties of our complicated system of government, seeing his way clearly; and being sure the ground on which he stood was solid enough to support him. Of all the public men now living, he is unquestionably the first in the confidence of all conservative men North and South. The geographical position of Pennsylvania, occupying the middle ground between the North and the South, would seem to give a peculiar fitness to the selection of a statesman from that section, to arbitrate between them, and the moral and intellectual qualities of Mr. Buchanan are such as seem exactly to fit him for the transcendently high and responsible position of executive mediator in such a crisis.

We conscientiously believe, there is no man in the Union who more heartily desires to see the grand experiment of American self-government succeed, or who more clearly discerns the true tendencies of the national mind, the moral and physical wants of the nation, and who in our foreign relations, having an eye to these wants, will be so sure to guide the ship of state safely and honorably through the raging elements of political strife both at home and abroad.

We may also take occasion to remark that the London Globe from which the subjoined extract is made, is one of the oldest and most conservative organs of the public opinion in England, speaking the sentiments at once of the thoughtful student of English history and of the great commercial class, who are so deeply interested in preserving the peace of the world:

[From the London Globe.]

MR. BUCHANAN IN ENGLAND.—It appears to have been generally calculated, that if Mr. Buchanan had been nominated at the Democratic Convention, that preliminary choice would be virtually his election to the Presidency; a result which could not have been the case with either of the other candidates had they been chosen. If Mr. Pierce had been nominated for re-election, the antagonism which he has provoked would have stimulated new efforts to displace him; and then, amid the conflicts of the Democratic party, a Whig candidate would have had a fair chance. And there are many considerations which are likely to render Mr. Buchanan less objectionable to some of the ill-classified political circles of the Union than any other candidate that could have been put forward. We treat the subject entirely as an internal question. We notice that some of the American papers give their support to Mr. Buchanan, as likely to be the friend of peace and Great Britain; while others equally support him as likely to be "firm" in administration and adverse to Great Britain. We do not put much faith in any of these vague and ill-sustained calculations. Should the "difficulties" between this country and the American Union continue into the period of Mr. Buchanan's Presidency, which is not to be assumed, we may at least calculate upon finding in him an adversary af ability and judgment. But it is, we repeat, principally upon internal grounds that his selection must have been determined. James Buchanan is a man of great vigor and acuteness. Trained as a lawyer and as a diplomatist, the natural shrewdness of his mind has been cultivated in a high degree. He is a man who must be a "tough customer" to deal with as an adversary; but a "customer" who knows too well how to look after the interests of his own side, to fall into any passionate or idle extremes. Few men have so large a round of personal acquaintences; from the North to the South, of the Old World and of the New—from Russia to Spain—from Massachusetts to beyond the Mississippi—in England as well as in America. Few men, therefore, are better able to appreciate the actual bearing of things in Europe. However Mr. Buchanan might be instigated by American motives, he would be guided by European experience.

Dr. Williams, an influential Whig and American, of Pike county, has come out in favor of Mr. Buchanan. He is constrained to this course, notwithstanding his opposition to "Squatter Sovereignty," which he by mistake attributes to the Democracy as one of its principles. He writes as follows:

"I will not at present ally myself with the Democratic party, but give it as my deliberate opinion that it is the only national organization now before the American people to which the South can look for safety.

"Let us stand aloof, or vote for Buchanan, and prevent, as I think, the election of Fremont. Suppose the country is so unfortunate as for Fillmore to receive the vote of two or three Slave States, the election will inevitably go to the House of Representatives, where it is demonstrable that Fremont has the majority. Let this sectional traitor be elected, discord and sectional animosity will ingulf this happy land in civil war; and in the language of the immortal Clay, (who wants to see the blood of any portion of our countrymen spilt?) I am not one of them; I wish to see war of no kind; but, above all, I do not desire to see a civil war."

The Utica Observer says: "Not a single paper in Philadelphia has raised the Fremont flag. Nor has the nomination of Fremont been ratified in that city."

The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Courier writing under date of July 29th, says Mr. Buchanan's chances are now brighter than at any previous time.

THE IRISH IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Under this head we copy from the Dublin Telegraph, the following exceedingly interesting article and letter—

The Argentine Republic, our readers are aware, has, for a considerable time, afforded a hospitable refuge to a great number of Irish Catholics, who have from time to time settled at Buenos Ayres, the capital, or along the fertile banks of the Parana. The region is an extensive one, occupying a superficies six and a half times more than that of the British Isles; and its prosperity has much increased since peaceful relations have been established with Monte Video, and the opening of the Rio de la Plata. Buenos Ayres is situated on the south bank of this river, about 150 miles from where it enters the ocean. The estuary opposite the town is about 36 miles wide: but the water is so shallow that large vessels cannot approach nearer than seven or eight miles of the city—a fact which has enabled many hardy Irish stevedores (engaged in the loading and unloading of vessels) to make handsome competencies. Buenos Ayres, which contains over 10,000 inhabitants, (some 30,000 French, English, Irish and Italians), is the emporium for European goods coming into the Republic, and for native produce going out. Although west of Buenos Ayres, the country, during the prevalence of northerly winds, is sometimes visited with almost insupportable heats, yet the climate is in general as salubrious as any in the world; and, as the country, in its physical aspect, may be divided into two sections—the mountainous and the plain—there is always an alternative at the disposal of the inhabitants. With this brief reference to a region which has already given, and can illimitably afford, a welcome to Irish Catholics, we introduce the annexed interesting letter from the Rev. Mr. Cullen, who some time since left Ireland to join the Irish mission in Buenos Ayres:

"BUENOS AYRES, May 28, 1836.

"I request you to bring to public notice the promising Irish mission of this province. The mail is already made up, but I write this in hopes of getting it forwarded by the packet. The Sisters of Mercy were received here with a real welcome, not only from the Irish but from the natives. The Catholic faith is deeply planted in the minds of the great mass of the population. The upper class, particularly amongst the females, is distinguished for piety and for works of charity. There is a society of ladies here named the "Society of Beneficence," who superintend the hospitals, viz., for men, for women, for foundlings, for female orphans, and for the insane. These good Senoras paid the most marked deference to our good Sisters and conducted them to visit the different establishments. The Sisters count ninety scholars. They would have nine hundred were there accommodation. Such is their confidence that they have commenced a large building, to be divided between cells, novitiate and school-rooms. In July and August, four native ladies of families of high respectability, are to be received, and the small community shall progress, under God's blessing, and confer a permanent blessing on the country. The Lord Bishop, the Rev. Dr. Mariano Jose Escalada Bustillos y Zeballos, who has been raised by Providence to govern this immense diocese, has manifested the greatest interest in the rising community of the Sisters of Mercy. He kindly visited them the day after their arrival, and sent a munificent donation of £30—great, considering the immense demands on his charity, and considering his benevolent disposition. His Grace has laid out a programme of visitation of his diocese, and has already administered confirmation to upwards of 4,000 persons, and brought to penance and a new life several who had been for years negligent: this in one section of the diocese. After the winter, which renders roads and rivers almost impassible, his Grace will resume. It may not be uninteresting to mention his Irish descent. His great grandfather was an Irishman—an O'Ryan. His charity and zeal are beyond all praise.

"Last Sunday, 25th May, being the anniversary of Independence of 1810, was celebrated a solemn High Mass and Te Deum, the Governor, government officials, corps diplomatique, ambassadors of French and other Catholic powers, joining in the procession round the Plaza, and the Most Holy Sacrament carried by the Bishop. The army lined the Plaza, and the national flag was blessed by the Bishop. Afterwards the flag was laid on the ground, and the Bishop stepped over it with Custodia in hand. The Governor, Don Pastor Obligado, is a most ardent Catholic. In the evening, the public buildings in the Plaza were illuminated with gas, which was used for the first time on this occasion. The concourse of people which thronged the Plaza was remarkable for their quiet and orderly behavior.

"I have made a missionary tour through the north part of Buenos Ayres. The Irish families are thickly spread—many wealthy, others progressing, and all above the reach of want. The natives harmonise with them. There is a great influx of people here from Westmeath and Wexford, and there is yet more wanted. Sheep farming pays well, and sobriety and industry insure success. We require some zealous Irish priests and a community of Christian Brothers. Yours, ever sincerely,

"JOHN CULLEN.

"P. S.—Rev. Antony Fahy is the Irish pastor here; I am about to settle in the northern part of the province, and shall furnish you with some notes occasionally."

Caution to the Public.—To distinguish the genuine magnetic powder, for the destruction of insects, from poisonous imitations, it is necessary to examine the wrapper. See that four national medals—those of England, France, Belgium, and the United States—are engraved thereon. Be sure also that a lithographic fac simile of Lyon's signature appears both on the wrapper and label. This caution is necessary to protect the proprietor from fraud and the public from danger and disappointment. The leading scientific societies, and the first chemists of Europe and America, have pronounced the magnetic powder the only poisonous insect bane in the world, as well as the most effective and fatal means for the destruction of bed-bugs, roaches, fleas, ants, flies, moths, &c., that was ever prepared or sold. The proprietors of the principal city hotels endorse it. Come and see the testimonials of Prince Albert, ex-President Fillmore, and hundreds of the nobility of Europe, as well as the sovereigns of America. The magnetic pills, for the extermination of rats and mice, are endorsed with equal emphasis by all who have tried them. Call and see the medals, diplomas, government orders, scientific certificates, letters, &c., at the Central Depot, No. 424 Broadway.

Yellow Fever!—When lassitude and weariness, when chilly fits and listlessness of everything around, when faintness, giddiness, flushing of the face, redness of the eyes, pains in the eye-balls and lower part of the forehead, when with these we have pain in the back, debility and sighing, there must be no time lost. If these be not the symptoms of yellow fever, they nevertheless admonish us that we are about to be alarmingly sick, and a dose of six or eight Brandreth's Pills cannot be too soon swallowed. Two or three such doses, and plenty of Indian meal gruel for a day or two, will entirely cure. The evacuations will prove the propriety of this course.

In all cases the Brandreth's Pills purify and invigorate the blood, and should be always resorted to by those of a costive habit.

Sold at 25 cents per box, at the principal office, No. 43 Canal street, Brandreth Building; at Burnton's bookstores, No. 296 Bowery, and 241 Hudson street; also, by Mrs. Hayes, No. 175 Fulton street, Brooklyn; E. I. Horsman No. 124 South Sixth street, Williamsburgh; by T. W. Dyott & Sons, Philadelphia; and by all respectable druggists and medicine venders in the Union.

CAUTION.—All Pills purporting to be Brandreth's Pills with "No. 241 Broadway" on the side label are counterfeits. aug23 1t

THE CAUSE OF CONSUMPTION.

BRONCHITIS.—WHAT PRODUCES BRONCHITIS?

FIRST STAGE OF DISEASE.

COSTIVENESS is the first link that connects disease in the System. It creates, induces, feeds and supports Bronchitis; and is slightly or indifferently treated, as though it was of no serious tendency: nevertheless, it has laid the foundation of that destroying disease, without the knowledge of the sufferers, undermining and sapping the very vitals of their constitutions.

Among the numerous class of diseases which afflict man, there is none more silent or treacherous in its approaches or more certain to triumph over its slowly consuming victim, than that formidable and insidious leveller of humanity—Bronchitis, which is produced by catching cold, through a neglect of regulating the state of the bowels when arriving to adult age. It seldom excites attention or alarm in the mind of any person, until it has sown the seed of disease and suffering in the human system, by checking the circulation of the blood; and it is to this source alone that we attribute the awful mortality of Consumption.

The following is a simple but correct illustration, namely:—If the culverts and sewers of the city were choked or clogged up, accidentally or otherwise, what would be the result? An overflow of accumulated filth and slush on the surface of the earth in its neighborhood, until it fills every hole, corner and crevice. This is quite similar to the human body, when the channel or sewer of life, as I may term it, which is the bowels, is checked or confined through constipation or some unnatural obstruction, which prevents the blood from circulating through the general system.

What, then, is the consequence? An accumulation of diseased matter and bile. Where will this bile and poisonous substance go to when it is prevented from taking its natural exit, through the bowels? It must surge itself back again into the blood, to be infused through the entire frame by the agency of the blood, bringing in its passage disease and suffering, and exhibiting itself by pain, nervous sensations and irritation all over the body—producing a bad feeling at the stomach, sourness of the food, a rush of blood to the head, catarrh, bronchitis, a short dry cough, dizziness, pain in the shoulders, and through or under the shoulder blades, cold feet, a peevish and irritable temper, annoyed by this hacking cough, and then gradually begins the expectorating from the throat of a lightish phlegm, resembling boiled starch or tough jelly of various colors, from a light to a darkish substance, and hawked up like a string.

SECOND STAGE.

From this period the patient is aware of some unusual and disagreeable feeling, though he seldom takes the hint till it goes from bad to worse. Catching cold from the slightest exposure, which he cannot avoid in consequence of the blood being in a diseased and corrupt condition for a long time previous to the appearance of those troublous symptoms, through the impure state of the blood, that at every breath the patient draws he inhales a similar quantity of fresh air by the nostrils and mouth, which keeps the tickling that exists in the throat and bronchial tubes in a ferment of irritation—this is the reason why some people complain of catching cold, even when confined to their room. Hence the sufferer is hacking, hawking, or expectorating a little at a time, with the impression that there is something in his throat that wants to come out; and which he desires to get out. There is a frequent desire for heavy sighing, with a dryness of the nostrils, which inclines the patient to pick or scratch them; sleepy, drowsy, dull, and heavy loss of appetite, and confused memory; a stuffing, tightness, and oppression of the chest, with a rawness and soreness of the gullet of the throat. This is caused by the silent enemy that has lurked in the system for months, and even years, and has at last aroused your fears, and well it might; for out of one hundred persons who die of Consumption ninety-nine are owing to disease of the throat alone, though simply called Bronchitis; and wretchedly treated by this self-pretended and dignified class of sheepskin physicians termed M. D.'s, who have proved a curse to the human family. They treat their patient on the following abusive principle, by cutting the tonsols and palate from the throat, as you might cut the gills out of a fish—next comes the solution or wash of nitrate of silver or caustic, and the whalebone swab, to wash and burn away the disease that has occupied the throat. Then comes the application of blister, and Croton oil externally to the throat and neck, to draw out the inflammation, as the physicians suppose (what blind philosophy.) Then comes the quack sheet of their MATERIA MEDICA—Calomel, Antimony, Morphine and Opium, to salivate and lull the feelings of the patient, which adds to the disease and increases the suffering, by giving the disease an opportunity of triumphing over nature. What a delusive idea to think the above treatment would be available in having recourse to those debilitating and irritating remedies of cutting, burning, blistering, purging and starving, which is of itself sufficient to lower and reduce the constitution of an ox.

THE THIRD STAGE

Confirms the above remarks. While undergoing this torturing treatment, the constitution is gradually failing and giving away, in giving rise to more alarming symptoms, evidently preparing its victim for the shroud, while the physician and friends fail to see the cause until those confirmed symptoms of consumption set in, but foolishly assign the cause to some other besides the genuine one, till the disease has reached its meridian, with a complication of fresh symptoms, breathing short and hurried, cough frequent, with an accumulation of corrupted matter, sometimes streaked with blood; profuse night sweats, emaciation and debility; cold chills in the forenoon, with a burning fever after; flesh soft and flabby, the limbs scarcely able to support the body; a susceptibility of catching cold on the least exposure, attended with a hoarseness and loss of voice, with a very heavy expectoration in the forenoon; flying pains in the chest, sides and shoulders, with a severe fit of coughing in the morning, or awaking from sleep. The painful crisis is fast approaching, with a swelling and puffing of the feet and ankles, and frequent attacks of diarrhœa. In females, the symptoms are more distressing at an earlier period than in the male, with a weakness in the back and loins, a sinking and exhausted feeling at the stomach, nervous and excitable, with gradual and frequent interruptions of the monthly flow, and as the disease progresses, a total or final cessation of it, with the harbinger of a broken down constitution which is a discharge of whites, a symptom that proves very debilitating and irritating to females.

All the above symptoms and sufferings are the fruits of costiveness at an early period, accruing to the sufferer through neglect of keeping the bowels in gentle operation, which would circulate the blood, and prove as ventilation to the general system, from the age of 18 to 26, when this disease creeps on and grows on, until every organ in the body is totally disorganized.

My long experience and observations, and my unprecedented success in treating consumption, inclines me to devote the remainder of my life to the cause of suffering humanity. I have cured more consumptive patients in the last ten years than any other doctor in the world in that time, and not by steam, smoke or vapor, nor by smelling medicine through an India rubber or glass tube, but through the selection I make from the forest and verdant meadows. I can always determine on examination whether I can be successful or not, and I speak accordingly. I have made it a rule to treat no disease longer than three weeks. If I cannot check the fatal progress of the disease in that time, I give up the patient as lost, and lead the sufferer to no further expense.

☞ In compliance with the repeated solicitations of consumptive patients living in remote parts of the country, I have opened an hospital at No. 178 Bowery, for the exclusive treatment of those laboring under any species of the above disease, where I can bestow on them the unremitted attention which the seriousness of their cases require; where I can be able to regulate their diet and regimen according to circumstances. Three weeks under the supervision of my especial care is worth four months at a distance.

All persons desirous of medical information can obtain it by enclosing one dollar, when all information and communication will be forwarded on receipt.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIL IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter, giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

I find on comparison with samples of Hodges' and Burnett's previously examined by me, and which I know to have been imported direct, that the quality of yours is by no means inferior to their celebrated compounds while the perfect method you posess of rectifying, insures an article of a higher degree of purity and flavor, when it has the equal advantage of time to soften it, than much of the so-called imported London gin. As a medicinal agent and cordial, under proper advice, it may be depended upon, from the care with which you select the essential oils combined with it in the distillation.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a subscriber to Mr. O'Mahoney's translation of the Foras Feasa ar Erinn.

That is a book long wanted, and which the "Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Eliot Hudson had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes, as Mr. O'Mahony.

I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

The old established house of Benziger Brothers, Eisiedeln, well known to many of the Hierarchy and the Rev. Clergy of the United States who have visited Switzerland, established this house in New-York four years ago, and they trust they will receive for the greatly increased advantages they offer, a continuance of that support, which for a period of over forty years has enabled them to build up, at the Pilgrimage of Our Lady of the Hermits (Einsiedeln) an establishment in which over four hundred persons are daily employed in the fabrication of the various articles that are used in the Church.

They desire particularly to call attention to their publications of PRAYER and DEVOTIONAL BOOKS, in German, French, Italian and Latin, consisting of over 200 different sorts. Being in immediate and constant intercourse with nearly all the principal publishers of Europe, they are enabled to offer a large assortment of standard THEOLOGICAL and LITURGICAL WORKS, among which are, the editions of Mechline, Paris, Ratisbone, &c., at exceedingly low prices.

HARPER'S NEW CATALOGUE.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter enclosing six cents in postage stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered in most instances at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, etc., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed the present Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

Study the Life of Mary!

THE OLD ESTABLISHED CATHOLIC HOUSE

OF

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

(JAMES B. KIRKER,)

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing, in monthly parts, at twenty-five cents each, and with the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

ARCHBISHOP OF NEW-YORK,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

By the

RIGHT REV. ROMUALD GENTILUCCI,

Chamberlain of Honor to His Holiness,

Dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness

POPE PIUS IX.,

ILLUSTRATED with fine steel engravings, and vignettes, borders, and initials, designed expressly for this work. This Life, published at Rome in 1848, by a Prelate high in the esteem of the Holy Father, is approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace, and has already been translated into other languages. Amid the many lives that have appeared, Gentilucci's will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of Ecclesiastical History that can in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of our Lord, as handed down in the loving traditions of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

It is a book for the studious as well as for the fervent Christian; a book for every one who seeks to rouse in his heart feelings of devotion for Her, whom the unerring Judge selected for the greatest honor which the human mind can conceive.

Conditions of the Work.

Gentilucci's Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a steel engraving in every number, and several fine woodcuts. Printed on fine paper, from new type, it will, when complete, form a most unique and beautiful volume of six to seven hundred and fifty pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

No other work of our day, on the same subject, can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of a learned and devoted son of the blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most Holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are not more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in the book. The translator has performed his task admirably.—Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers, whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truthteller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the Bible of the same enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

This work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work, translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

Inducement.

Each subscriber to this splendid work will receive with the last number a magnificent steel engraving, suitable for framing, of the

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of their departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; for persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN QUESTION.

ALLEGED SPECIAL EMBASSY OF MR. LOWE TO THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Lowe, the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, quietly slipped on board the Cunard steamer Canada, which sailed on the morning of Saturday last for Boston, and by the middle of next week will be doubtless be on his way from New-York to Washington, to settle with Mr. Marcy and the President all the points in dispute between the two countries relative to the Central American difficulty.

The visit of Mr. Lowe on diplomatic business of an important kind takes place at a moment especially opportune. The retiring President, like a dying sinner, will have no object in being contumacious. His dream of ambition is over; his days of official life are drawing to a close; and the absorbing feeling of his soul will be to settle everything amicably, honorably, and in a way the best calculated to blot out the memory of his past follies and misdeeds. He can make no capital by keeping open old sores. On the contrary, to descend from the chair of State with the consciousness of having settled a dispute between the two countries which at one time wore an angry aspect, may constitute his sole claim to the gratitude of his countrymen—may be the one solitary act of his Presidential life which will save him from cotemporaneous oblivion.

But although the time is opportune, the mission is delicate, and we cannot help asking ourselves the question, whether Mr. Lowe is the best man who could be found to carry it out? We were particularly happy in our last special Ambassador to the United States. In the person of Lord Ashburton we sent to Washington one of the merchant-princes of England; a man who had enormous business transactions throughout every city in the Union, and a weight of character, the result of long successes, which elicited respect and admiration. He had been created a nobleman because of his commercial eminence—just the personage that the Americans delighted to honor, and he was in the largest sense a type of the old English gentleman—polite, affable, and most liberal in his expenditure. At that time, Mr. Buchanan, now a candidate for the Presidency, filled, as Secretary of State, the office whose duties Mr. Marcy now discharges, and the representatives of the two Governments speedily brought the boundary-line within the grasp of a well-defined treaty.

We are unwilling to speak disparagingly of Mr. Lowe, who is a self-raised and clever man—clever in the sense in which the Americans understand the term—that is to say "sharp;" but we question, nevertheless, whether he is exactly the man for an emergency. Diplomacy, it occurs to us, is quite out of his line. He would much rather cut the Gordian knot than endeavor to unravel it. His temper is short, and his pride excessive—qualities which have marred his House of Commons advancement, and which we hope he will not introduce to the White House. But Mr. Lowe lacks another essential—official standing. He is comparatively new to Parliament, in which he sits for the first time; and his position in the Government hardly justifies the honor which has been thrust upon him. He may, and we hope will, realize the expectations of those who have sent him across the Atlantic; and in the event of his success, at which no one will more heartily rejoice than ourselves, we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that he succeeded when it was almost impossible to fail.

If, instead of sending Mr. Lowe as our special Ambassador to Washington, Lord Palmerston had pressed the acceptance of the duties on Mr. Wm. Brown, a better choice could not have been made. For a delicate affair of this kind, Mr. Brown possesses every requisite—experience, coolness, judgment, courtesy, and those other hardly less important auxiliaries of great wealth and business tact, with which the Americans are always enamored. Mainly to Mr. Brown's exertions, as the personal friend of Mr. Dallas, and who also enjoyed the confidence of Lord Palmerston, may be attributed the happy turn which the ejection of Mr. Crampton took. It would have required, we know, a good deal of pressure on the part of the Premier to induce Mr. Brown to accept the commission; but if he had been induced to undertake it, success would have followed in his wake, and by the opening of Parliament in February, Lord Palmerston would have been in a position to announce the happy result of the mission—an announcement which would have done much to strengthen and consolidate his Government.—European Times.

IMPORTANT FROM ITALY.

The Turin correspondent of the London Times (Aug. 6,) says, the news received here to-day from the Legations, though apparently trifling in itself, is really such as gives promise of events of the highest importance, not only for that division of the country, but for the whole of Italy. It is stated that the municipal council of Ravenna has followed the example of that of Bologna, and voted an address to the Pope, praying for the removal of the Austrian occupation, and it is added that many others if not all the municipalities of the large towns in those provinces are likely to adopt similar resolutions.

At Ravenna, the proposition for an address was first mooted in the council by Ippolyto Raspano, an old man of 80 years of age, who has never been a political character, and who is held in the greatest respect by all his countrymen; he was warmly seconded by Count Gamba and Dr. Fusconi, and two or three others, and opposed by the Mayor or "Gonfaloniere," Signor Facchinetti; but on the question being put to the vote, after some discussion, Signor Facchinetti was left nearly alone in his opposition, and the address was carried therefore almost by unanimity. You see here then some of the first fruits of that independence and open speaking inaugurated by Count Marsigli, in the municipal council of Bologna, but to appreciate fully the moral courage necessary for such a line of conduct it must be recollected that both Bologna and Ravenna are in a state of siege, and therefore of course subject to the arbitrary government of an Austrian officer. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that the members of the municipal councils were all nominated by Cardinel Antonelli on the return of the Pope from Gaeta in 1849, in violation of the Papal decree which vested the right of election in the burgesses, and his Eminence naturally selected his nominees from those classes which would have most to fear from any popular ferment—from the rich and the noble—in hopes of finding them readier instruments wherewith to carry out his own retrograde policy. The happiest omen derived from this movement, therefore, is that the upper classes are now coming forward in proper position as the legitimate champions of the people, against the unjust despotism of the crown. As yet the Roman government has not vouchsafed any direct answer to the Bologna address, but the practical reply to that document may be found in the fact that the government has postponed as long as possible the assembling of other municipal councils.

REPUBLICAN MOVEMENT IN FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says: I understand that the Republican party have resolved to make an effort to return members of their persuasion at the general election for Paris. The report is that they will put forward MM. Carnot, Vidal and Proudhon, the first representing the bougeoise Republicans, the second the operative classes, and the third the ultra theorists. What these three gentlemen, in the event of their elections, mean to do about the oath of fidelity to the Emperor, I cannot say. In all probability they would refuse to take the oath and leave the election as a protest. But I cannot believe that the Emperor's faithful servants will always be able to prevent the ballot boxes from showing forth any seditious results. The present government and free election are essentially incompatible. Nevertheless, it will be a hard task next year to keep up the fiction that France is unanimously devoted to existing institutions.

German Emigration to America.—The Emigration Society, established last year at Frankfort, has just published a report of its proceedings, from 1st February, 1855, to the 31st January, 1856. The society is composed of 230 members, paying an annual subscription. The receipts during the above period were 1,111 florins, and it had in hand, on the 31st January, 384 florins. The protection and assistance rendered to emigrants during the year were very considerable. Upwards of 1,047 persons applied for advice and direction on the subject of emigration, and sixty-seven persons renounced the idea of leaving the country, in consequence of the advice given. The emigrants who have had relations with the company took abroad with them a sum of 310,000 florins. According to the report, the diminution which took place last year in the number of emigrants going from Germany to the United States is attributed to the following causes: to the bad harvest in America in 1854; to the number of industrial and banking establishments which have been started in Germany, having given employment to capital which was formerly devoted to the purpose of emigration; and lastly, to the unfavorable reports sent home from America by many emigrants, whose expectations had been disappointed.

Statistics of Sardinia.—From a statistical table in the Piedmontese Gazette, it appears that while in 1850 there were 6,737 schools in the kingdom of Sardinia, affording elementary instruction to 261,118 children, the number at present is 9,435, with 402,067 pupils. There are about 90 periodicals published in the kingdom, including one literary review, three agricultural magazines, one ditto commercial, one manufacturing, two legal, three medical, and one of veterinary surgery; a bulletin of statistics and railways; a military journal; several others for advertisements, and the rest political.

Exhibition of Swiss Industry.—A letter from Berne states that preparations are already making for the general exhibition of Swiss Industry, which is to take take place next year; and a commission has been appointed to carry out the measure, of which M. Staempfli, the President of the Confederation, is the head. It was at first intended to confine the exhibition to the productions of the inferior trades, but it is now decided that it shall extend to every branch of Swiss Industry. The precise period for its opening has not yet been fixed.

From the N. O. Delta.

A TRANQUIL COMMUNITY.

The aspect of society in Ireland has become calm and hopeful of late, and in some particulars is almost satisfactory to the people themselves. Crime is very rare; emigration, except to Australia, is decreasing, and the sensible men of the country have turned their attention, in all the cities and towns, to useful and remunerative labor. So far Ireland is doing as well as a slave can be expected to do.

The Dublin correspondent of the New-York Times—a chatty West Britisher—declares that not a single offence against the law, of any magnitude or importance, except the militia riot, which the old fool regards as a crime, has been committed in any portion of the south; even Tipperary, with the aforesaid exception, being as well-behaved as if they never shot a landlord when he deserved it. The judges, he says, find their offices little better than sinecures, and the lawyers are all preparing to visit the diggings at the earliest opportunity. No crime any where, therefore no fees. It must be pitiable to see the countenances of the assembled juveniles in the hall of the Four Courts of Dublin.

It is remarkable that a people, so free from crime at home, should be exposed to many charges of recklessness, violence, and immorality in the United States. It is scarcely fair to judge of them by a few political loafers scattered through the several cities, for we have reason to know that in the agricultural districts they have won a position amongst our most estimable and profitable citizens. Even in the cities, where the Devil, who is a cosmopolitan and belongs to every country, walks abroad with persistent step, neither he nor they are half as black as they are painted.

We do not say this because we require their "sweet voices" to assist us in obtaining an office, but simply because it is due to their national character, which has been grossly misrepresented of late, and sweepingly assailed. If they are not, as a whole, a hard-working, good-natured, kindly and most gullible people, we, as well as the Democratic leaders of New Orleans, are greatly deceived. Our business, however, is not with their gullibility, but with the facts which the correspondent of the Times has published to the world. Their credulity belongs to the politicians, who can manage to mistake their "brogans" for patent-leather shoes, and the bog-trotting antecedents, attributed to them by the Courier, for evidences of present refinement and elegance; we are interested in their manhood alone, their development, their improvement, their intellectual progress, and we always hail with pleasure any indication of the increasing prosperity of their race.

A serious assault was committed by an inmate of the Limerick Lunatic Asylum, named Patrick Meehan, on the gardener, Mr. Michael Hamilton. Mr. Hamilton had charge of Meehan and two other lunatics while laboring in the kitchen-garden attached to the asylum. When the bell tolled the dinner hour, he proceeded to open the gate to let them into their meal. While doing so, Meehan snatched up a pitchfork and stabbed the gardener in the face. He was about to repeat the blow, were it not for the prompt assistance rendered by another of the lunatics, who grasped at the pitchfork and, after a struggle, succeeded in depriving him of it. Meehan was then arrested and confined.—Limerick Observer.

MUNSTER NEWS.

BY A COMMERCIAL TRAVELLER.

O'Brien's retirement—the Nenagh Riots—Revolution Dead—"Soupers" in Kilkenny—Police and Proselytism—Aid for France—From Kilkenny to New Ross—Goat's Hill better than Sarsaparilla—T. Meagher, M. P., and the Waterford Mechanics' Institute—St. Patrick's Chapel—Dunmore—Terry O'Driscol at Tramore—Visit to Mount Mellary—Johnny Power, of Gurteen, at O'Mahony's Camp, and a Fox Hunt, &c.

Before I set out on my commercial tour, I thought I should have had more news for you by waiting till I visited Kilkenny, New Ross, Waterford, &c., but now I find myself the possessor of very trifling pieces of gossip, which, however, I will jot down for you, lest further delay would result in a blank.

O'Brien's declining to stand for Tipperary meets with public approval everywhere. The reasons he assigns for so doing satisfy even those who were most desirous of seeing him again in Parliament. His letter on the subject is admirable.

The Nenagh riots are still the great topics of discussion. For my part, I'm hardly at all interested in the subject. 'Twas a poor affair. There was no grand principle underlying the mutiny. It was animated by no patriotic spirit. There wasn't a spark of patriotism in it from first to last. It was selfish, mean, and driftless. The shooting of Curly was cowardly in the extreme. Our countrymen in America, I sincerely trust, have not been led away, by the exaggerated reports of the affray, into the belief that Ireland is ripe for revolution. The revolutionary sentiment is dead, for the present at least. Such, at-all-events, is my honest conviction. A conviction I was very slow to arrive at, and very reluctant to confess. But, the truth should always have the road. Nothing will better serve man or country. Be it bitter or be it sweet, it's the only wholesome stuff for both. 'Twould of course be infinitely more agreeable or me to write otherwise than in this spirit; and, perhaps, you and I would be greater favorites with the Irish in America were we more hopeful and exciting. Pleasant and brilliant falsehoods however are commodities which I shan't dispense.

While I was in Kilkenny there was a most offensive scene enacting in the Court-House. This was the "Souper Investigation," which is neither more nor less than a degrading attempt at proselytism. These "Soupers" as they are called, headed by the Rev. Mr. Graves, are not satisfied to worship how, and when, and where they choose themselves, but go stalking about "seeking whom they may devour," with the rankest language abusing the religious tenets of their Catholic fellow-citizens. The authorities, however, determined that their "Marble City" should not be further plagued. Mr. Scott, the Crown-Solicitor, immediately commenced a prosecution. The Mayor, Willam Lanigan, Esq., Joseph Greene, Esq. R. M., and the other local magistrates were on the Bench. Mr. Greene declared the defendants had acted with gross ingratitude to the police of the city, who had so long protected them from the hands of their Catholic fellow-citizens whose religion they dared to outrage. Mr. Scott, who knew them well, pronounced them "the most mischievous disturbers that ever infested the city."

The gentry of both the city and county of Kilkenny have most bounteously come forward, without distinction of class or creed, in aid of the poor French sufferers. That's right, and proves what I always knew that the story of the fighting cats was but a fable. Moreover they have now a well and honestly edited paper in the Journal, which seeks not to toady to any class but gives them the honest truth. Speaking in the last issue on the present state of "Irish politics," the editor boldly condenses the whole into a nut-shell. He says—

"On the whole, the gist of Irish politics at present seems to be that James Sadleir has escaped with impunity—and Galway has received Judge Keogh with blazing of bonfires and tolling of bells."

Off to New-Ross. What a glorious drive it is from Kilkenny to Ross? What an enchanting spot is Woodstock, the residence of Mr. Tighe? I could lovingly hover round that scene. But a traveller must be up to time, so on I sped and entered the city so full of reminiscences of Priestly patriotism and manly worth. My delay was a short one, but I found time to clamber up "Goat's Hill." You are, doubtless, proud of your Tramore "Constitution Hill," but "Goat's Hill" beats you out hollow. To the citizens of Ross, a clamber to its summit before breakfast, must be worth more than a whole course of dandelion, or lime-water, or even America's widely puffed-up decoction called "Dr. Townsend's Sarsaparilla!"

On entering Waterford I proceeded to Cummin's Hotel where I usually put up when on my annual migration. The various items of news which I have read and heard of may be summed up thus:

Your Father has returned from London, is well and has presented the Mechanics' institute with the following Parliamentary Reports, &c., for the Session 1856: The Joint Stock Companies' Act; Wreck Chart of the British Isles for 1855; Geological Survey; Estimates, &c.; Civil Services; Loan Fund Board of Ireland, eighteenth annual report; New Palace, Westminster, report No. 1; Irish Reproductive Loan Fund; for which their managing committee have returned him a vote of thanks.

St. Patrick's Chapel has recently been newly roofed, and its interior decorations are now being admirably renovated. Father Kent deserves much credit for accomplishing these desirable results. There is to be a Bazaar for the Society of St. Vincent de Paul at the Town-Hall in a few days. Great crowds are expected to attend. Lord Waterford is much blamed for refusing a site for a School-house at Kilmacthomas. Sir E. Kennedy has, however, supplied the want and otherwise generously assisted the laudable project. Dunmore is full of visitors. A correspondent of the Waterford News writes—

"Quietness, pure and gentle sea and land-breezes, bringing the blush of health to mantle the cheek of the weak or sickly, offer inducements to the invalid or seeker of robust health not to be met with elsewhere; whilst the lovers of aquatic sports, or those who wish for active exercise or romantic scenery, have advantages offered to them not surpassed, if equalled, in our dear 'little isle of the ocean.' The new and beautiful walk wending its way through woody lands from Dock to Dunmore (old), and the many walks along the margin of the sea, on the lofty summit of grand old mountains, whose base is ever washed by the restless sea, are daily crowded with light-hearted and bright-eyed pedestrians, whose ringing laugh give note of unbounded joyousness."

Benjamin Graham, Treasurer of the Waterford Mechanics' Scientific Institute, acknowledges the receipt of £10, being a life subscription from David Malcomson, Esq., of Portlaw. He also acknowledges the receipt of £3, being a donation from Sir Richard Musgrave, Bart. T. G. Evelyn will deliver a course of lectures on Political Economy before the Institute in September; and A. G. Melville, Professor of Natural History in Galway College, will deliver a second course on Natural History in October. Other popular lectures, with readings from Dickens, Thackeray, &c., will follow during the winter.

Mr. Terrence O'Driscoll and family have been to Tramore. I send you a few extracts of his last correspondence from that healthful spot:

Priest's Road, Tramore, 20th July, 1856.

SIR—Since I last had the pleasure of addressing you, the weather has become mighty hot intirely, and the surest sign (so Betty Kelly's daughter says) is that the indipindent frinds are flocking out to the say.

'Pon my conshense but I am puzzled, when I think what will Lord Panmure do with the intrepid militia; it is too bad to disband them and turn them off without their inexpressibles, or, as Jemmy Hayes used to call them, unsurmountables. Faith, they must turn their hand to something to support nature, and they will be apt to stop a mail-coach occasionally, and take loans, without saying as much as "be yer lave."

I brought Mrs. O'Driscoll down to see the band of the Co. Dublin light infantry the other evening, and she was mightily plased with the music, conducted by that able leader, Mr. Lerray; it was a mighty windy evening intirely, and whin the band commenced playing on the Dunneraile walk, the gorsoons had to hold their hair to keep it from blowin' off their heads.

I wunder very much that patriotic nobleman, Lord Dunneraile, would not get wooden binches on his handsum walk; pursuin' to me if a person can get a dacent sate there now, without running the risk of getting a cowld, or somethin' worse, from sitting in the grass, and where respectable females are constantly there, there ought to be some good binches and American rocking chairs.

As Mrs. O'Driscoll took a long walk this evening, to pay her respects to the metal man, she is very tired and calling out for some drink, to make up for the fluids escaped in her exertions over the ditches; and as I know how to plaze her in that respect, I must close the letter to make her somethin' nourishing as well as cheerful, for she desarves attention.

Yours truly, T. O'DRISCOLL.

Here is a beautiful and a just tribute to the worth of the Collegiate Seminary of Mount Melleray, which I extract from the Cork Examiner:

There can be, in our opinion, no more delightful duty to the Catholic chronicler of passing events than to record the onward march of education, and the consequent development of the intellectual faculties of the youth of this old dear land, so famed throughout the glorious ages of faith for its saints, philosophers, and sages. Among the many monuments devoted to the advancement of science and religion which have risen up of late amongst us, there is not perhaps one working more effectually, yet silently, in the cause of God and his Church, than the now celebrated seminary of Mount Melleray. The sanctity of the good monks of Melleray has been so often the theme of so many eulogies, and their primitive life the subject of such universal admiration, that we feel it would be quite superfluous in us to add a single word of praise, so decidedly transcendent are the sanctity and usefulness of these good and holy Cistercians. Who is not struck with admiration as well as astonishment on entering the Mount Melleray Seminary—the nursery of literature, morality, and religion, so isolated from the noisy, busy world, and imbedded as it is amid the frowning and gigantic range of the Knockmealdown mountains! It is delightful to enter its noble and capacious class-halls, and to see there assembled so many Catholic youths, not only from our own but distant lands, imbibing the learning and sanctity of those true servants of God, and sedulously preparing themselves to carry the bright lamp of faith to far-distant regions, and to hold it up to show to the pagan and the infidel the way to life eternal.

Twenty-six of the young gentlemen are to leave this year for various colleges, viz., All-Hallows, Rome, Carlow, and Waterford. Of this number, 22 are for the foreign missions, 18 of whom have entered their names for the college of All-Hallows. Long may Mount Melleray continue a nursery for those missions, and long, very long, may its far-famed seminary enjoy the beneficent and invaluable superintendence of its reverend and beloved President, Brother Xavier, and of his no less deserving and sanctified compeers, Fathers Ignatius and Anthony, Brothers Augustine and Gabriel. Thank God that however our beloved Ireland may be oppressed and trampled upon, still Catholicity grows and flourishes in the land, and, not even satisfied with preserving it pure and untainted for our own race and blood, Ireland annually sends forth her ardent missioners to spread the gospel truth throughout distant and un-Christian lands, and never tires in bringing back the strayed sheep to the one true fold of Christ.

There has just been a grand ball at the Great Hotel, in Tramore. It is said to have been the most brilliant that ever took place there. I doubt it; for I remember those that came off under the auspices of poor Johnny Power, of Gurteen. They were rare sport. You must remember, about the time I allude to, that characteristic attempt of his to drive his tandem through Miss Gibbons' shop and up to the News-room. Then his "schooling" parties across from Newtown to Gararisk, at which, mounted on his cream-colored cob, he led over the fiercest leaps, even those who bestrode Valentine and Tidy—are surely not forgotten. He was a glorious fellow. The noblest, most generous and confiding of souls. Alas! that those very amiable qualities, from his bright happy entry into life until its sad dark close, should have made him the victim of knaves and swindlers. But it is ever so! If the people fought in '48, I know he was sure to be with them. His visit to O'Mahony's Camp was not, as it was considerately made to appear, compulsory. It was made to see if there was such force, such spirit, such preparation as would give even the slightest promise of success. There wasn't, and he went home sad and disheartened.

The last time I met him was at a run with the "Kilkennies," from Frankfort to the Punch-bowl. It was the best gallop of the season. There were some two hundred in the field. Johnny, as usual, rode wide, and on a line for himself; but just as I reached the bound wall on the top of Clomanto, Hill, where those who were there before me were pounded, and was lucky enough to get over it somehow, I saw him pop it, a few perches to my left. From that to the old Church, where the dogs over-ran the scent, with the solitary addition of Sir John, we had it all to ourselves. Now or then, I could not desire better company.

These are saddening though fond memories. I daily grow more and more weary of the slavish spirit which pervades this beauteous old historic land. I often wish I were with you, and endowed with the highest earthly honor—the citizenship of America.

MOUNT-GARRET, THE BAG-MAN.

DUBLIN LETTER.

DUBLIN, Aug. 9th.

The Dublin Canals—A Patriotic Pump—O'Connell's birth-day—Tenant League—a collection of Idlers and the School-master "at home"—the Thermometer the political guide of the country—a tale of a Comet—Cowardice of the Nation—Mitchel—the Men in Galway—Judge Keogh, Anthony O'Flaherty, and the Dundalk Democrat—Repentant Patriot on a small salary, Mr. Wm. Gernon—the Low Back'd Car a national institution—Aldermen John Reynolds, Dr. Gray, Roe, and Cod—Razors warranted to shave a Prince—Longfellow and Balfe, the Composer—Light Fingers and Loyal Ladies—Watch and Pray—Smith O'Brien.

You pick out the news from the Irish papers so industriously, that I'm beginning to think there's hardly any use in my sending you a letter. For the name of the thing, however, I had better keep to it.

The Lord Lieutenant is about to present the 18th Royal Irish with a new stand of colors. The old colors will be laid to rest within the solemn stately walls of St. Patrick's Cathedral. His Excellency, I understand, purposes officiating on the occasion with great pomp.

A writer in the Daily Express denounces the slimy and fetid condition of the Dublin canals. The Royal canal, it appears, is choked up with weeds; so much so as to impede the traffic of the boats, and disease the water. The north side of Dublin is supplied from this canal. Very serious consequences may therefore result from the state in which it is now. In connection with this subject, Constable Clancey's efforts to purify the old lanes and alleys of the city, deserve notice. A small water-engine, built for the Corporation by Daly of Wickham street, is energetically worked day and night in this hot weather. Masses of dirt are driven out by it, and spots, which nothing else could clean, are made sweet and wholesome. The Nation is eloquent in its description of the pump.

There's been a dinner at King's Hotel, Phibsborough, to celebrate the birthday of O'Connell. The company consisted of a few most amiable noodles. The Chairman, Mr. T. Dillon, in giving the toast of the evening, said "they all knew and admired the character of the departed Liberator, who was the friend of his country and his Queen."

Hurrah for O'Connell, that's loyal and true!
Hurrah for the Queen, with her garter so blue!

The Tenant League is still in session. It sticks pertinaciously to the bare benches in Bachelor's walk. Nothing will melt or wrench it from there. It's as tight there as a muscle on the bottom of a Dungarvan hooker. Shiel's application of a fable of Aristophanes to the Lord Manners, occurs to me vividly. The League, the dernier part of an effete agitation, like Lord Manners, the wrinkled remnant of an exploded ascendancy, adheres "with an ignoble tenacity behind." Gravely speaking, the League is a small collection of idlers. Martin O'Brennan, a teacher of the classics and the use of the globes, is the animating spirit of the group. He uses the demagogue's birch with a stinging acidity. Members of Parliament and mankind in general are whipped by him smartly at the "weekly meetings" on Bachelor's walk.

Talking of politics and the heat of the weather, the Nation of this morning gives us the following:—

"Political excitement is unthought of—it is a thing impossible with the thermometer up to 80 degrees in the shade. 'Party spirit' has evaporated; spirit of every kind is avoided as much as possible, and fans and cooling beverages rise in demand. The only topic ventured on just now is something meteorological. We learn that this is the season for falling stars. We are desired to take observations in the cool of the evening, and the result is that nothing new has been discovered overhead, but there is a great increase in serenading. A Limerick gentleman, indeed, is of opinion that he has seen the great comet which vanished out of sight just 300 years ago, and which it is expected ought to be back by this time. He is not very positive about it, however, seeing that the learned folk who have calculated in Arabic figures its weight and force, and the length of the long axis of its ellipsis, say that the eccentric orb may possibly mislead them to the extent of three years; but, by the shade of Sir Isaac Newton, no further.

"He (the Limerick observer) was standing on Wednesday last near the salmon weir on the platform before the mills of Corbally, about half-past ten o'clock, when his attention was attracted by what seemed to be a fire rising on the top of Keeper Mountain, due east of his position. He remarked the object to a gentleman who was with him, but, as the fire rose and cleared the top of the mountain, his friend suggested that it must be a lantern appended to a kite. It had then the appearance of a globe of fire as large as a good-sized orange with a broad tail extending about eighteen inches from the body. The two gentlemen watched it for an hour, and the watchman on the weir observed it also. On Thursday night they all saw it again. It rose a few moments later, presenting the same appearances, and was high in the heavens at half-past eleven, when they went home. Last night, from the same place, the same parties again saw it rise about twenty minutes before eleven o'clock, and then it first occured to one of them that it might be a comet."

The Nation, by-the-by, has a scandalous article this week in disparagemant of Mitchel. When will public writers learn to be otherwise than cowardly and spiteful? Is it magnanimous of a paper to be incessantly disparaging a man like Mitchel—a bold, and brilliant and devoted man—because, forsooth, Mitchel and Duffy had a quarrel? Because, forsooth, Duffy was formerly editor of the Nation? And is it manly, is it brave, to be cruelly wounding a chivalrous, high-souled fellow with imputations against his honor, when thousands of miles intervene, and the assaulted and aggrieved party is thereby prevented from calling his assailant to account? The editor of the Nation should think of this, and hold over any further insults of the kind, until he and Mitchel stand upon the same soil, within speaking, and, if need be, pistol-shot of each other.

Judge Keogh has had fine times of it in Galway. They've been throwing up their greasy hats and hurrahing for him in the Court-house, and all through the streets and puddle you have been recently describing with so much vivacity. Anthony O'Flaherty, amongst others, presented the gracious young Judge with a congratulatory address. The huge herd of "dumb and driven cattle," who voted for Monahan in 1847, were vociferous in the crimson-clad slave's ovation. Many others who since then have repented of their patriotism, and become rogues and beggars, joined the uproarious rabble. The Dundalk Democrat—far away, in my opinion, the boldest truth-teller we have amongst us—writes that "had they burned Keogh in effigy, they would have done a more righteous deed, than giving an ovation to such a character. Shame, eternal shame upon the slaves of Galway!"

O'Connell used to say "there wasn't a hat-full of honesty in Galway." It's my conviction, at present, there isn't the full of an egg-cup.

By-the-bye, talking of repentance from patriotism, I might as well mention that Mr. William Gernon, barrister-at-law, Dublin, has been appointed one of the Secretaries to the Board of Bequests. It's a small salary. 'Twill suit Gernon, however, uncommonly well, for Gernon is a very small man. A superannuated Repealer resuscitates wonderfully on £400 a year. You remember Gernon, of course, in the palmy and balmy days of the Repeal Association? What a constant attendant he was in the Committee-room and the Omnibus-box of that "supernal confederation of moral and ethical electricities," as Tom Steele, the Head-Pacificator, would say. 'Twould have been well for his reputation had Gernon satisfied himself with lending the light of his countenance to the regeneration of Ireland. His countenance, to be sure, wasn't very luminous. But it was many degrees brighter than either his brain or his tongue. His speeches in Conciliation Hall, at the '82 Club, and here and there when he went "circuit," were flatulent and stale. They were so to as sickening excess. Recently he has confined his rhetorical displays to the meetings of the Deaf and Dumb Institute. Were he to imitate (in public, at-all-events) the infirmities of those in whose favor (he imagines) he lavishes his eloquence on such touching occasions, he would gracefully evince the charity of his nature. What a crowd of flimsy anatomies there are scattered through Dublin, of whom the newly-appointed Secretary of Bequests is the transparent type? Crawling for years all over the pillars and benches of the Four Courts, the spongy poor maggots (some of them) now and then break into butterflies. The transformation generally occurs, where the heat of the Castle Kitchen happens to penetrate.

There's been another loud wail about the outside cars. The first broke out from the Music Hall. This last one comes to us from under the dome of the Royal Exchange. The Corporation sits there. Alderman John Reynolds led the lamentation. The lamentation at intervals swelled into a howl. Like the man in the song—

"He scratched his ould poll
And looked after the Low-back'd Car."

The Police Commissioners, it appears, turned a deaf ear to the petitioners of Abbey-st., of whose proceedings I informed you a few weeks ago. Despite the pathetic anecdotes of the Alderman, and the eloquent sorrows, poured out by Dr. John Gray over the "jarvies," the only concession the authorities in this case would admit was just this and no more—"the driver is permitted to sit on the side of his car when he has a 'fare' who does not obfect." By the obnoxious bye-law or Police ordinance in question, the driver is compelled to sit on the "box." His being compelled to do this is the great grievance of Ireland now-a-days. John Reynolds and the Freeman's Journal proclaim it. Who can doubt the solemn word of two such exemplary patriots? John Reynolds tells us—

"It is the plain intention of the Recorder and Mr. O'Ferral to annihilate, if they could, the outside cars, fifteen hundred of which were at that moment plying for hire in the city of Dublin. Within the last week another order had been issued to the police, who were now directed to raise the straddles and see if the bones were galled. This had been done, and in one case, the driver was taken from his seat and brought to the police court, and the horse put into livery, where it would remain until th veterinary surgeon cured the gall."

Aldermen Roe and Codd took exception to the views expressed by this silvery speaker. Both of them defended the Police Commissioners. And thus the matter stands, subject to more meetings in the Music Hall, more petitions, and the loudest braying and upbraiding.

Mr. Tweedall, Lower Sackville street, has just finished a very beautiful case of razors for his Highness, Meer Ali Moorad Khan Talpoor, of Kyoorpoor, a sumptuous Indian prince, who has been for the last few weeks knocking about London. There's a plumed turban in massive folds of gold upon the lid of the case, and a text from the Koran in diamonds. This satisfies me that, without Repeal and Tom Steele, Ireland is destined to put a penny in her pocket before Methusalah returns. Then again, I find that the new line of steam-packets between Milford Haven and Waterford has proved decidedly successful. The first trip (and only trip as yet) was accomplished in five hours and a half. By this line, connecting with the South Wales Railway, Waterford is brought within thirteen hours' journey of London. Who would have dreamt of it twenty years ago? Twenty years ago! Who would have dreamt of it five years ago? The Lord be with the times your grand-mother took four days to travel from your native city to Dublin!

I well remember the ecstasies with which you used to speak of Longfellow's Hyperion, immediately after you first read it, in the summer of '44. I well remember, too, your quoting, at the great soiree given to you in Waterford in May, '48, those noble lines of his—

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time."

In a word, I believe you as gratefully loved Longfellow for the exquisite sensibility and delicious softness and sweetness of poetry, as you stoutly swore by and clung to Ralph Waldo Emerson for the brave philosophy he spoke in his Essays and Orations, and the words of pure light and power in which it was conveyed. The following little note, therefore, from Longfellow to Balfe,the author of the Bohemian Girl, and a distinguished countryman of ours, (he's from Cork, born and bred there, no one disputes that,) will greatly please you:

My Dear Sir—I feel very much flattered by your friendly note and the precious volume of music which came with it; and I should not be so tardy in my thanks, had I not been laid upon my sofa with a lame knee for the last month. Finally, I have crept from Cambridge to this sea-side place, and am well enough to sit at a table and write. One of my first letters is to acknowledge your beautiful gift, and to say how successful this musical translation of my poems seems to me. You have sung them better than I did; for, after all, music reproduces the mood of mind in which a piece is written better than words can. For all these various and beautiful melodies, these interpretations of my thoughts, I very sincerely thank you; and beg to assure you that I truly appreciate this token of your regard for what I have written, and all the friendly expressions of your letter.

Believe me, my dear Sir, yours very faithfully,

Henry W. Longfellow.

Nahant, near Boston, July 12, 1856.

Isn't it delightful thus to find two beautiful intellects weaving their warm sympathies into a golden web across the waters between Ireland and America, and the summer sun, out of the abundance of its glory, studding the web with emeralds and sapphires?

From the poetry to the prose of life is an instantaneous transition, whenever one likes it. From the Rhine, as Longfellow beheld it, to the Liffey, as policemen and Inspectors of Nuisances report it, a second suffices. A number of light-fingered gentry (ladies and gentlemen) have lately arrived in Dublin, from London, it appears. Two decent ladies had their pockets neatly picked, the other day, at the terminus of the Droheda railway, whilst in the act of purchasing tickets for Malahide, to which pretty village they were bound, in company with the Earl of Carlisle, for the regatta. The fair loyalists were so entranced with his Lordship—the light of his countenance so completely lifted them out of their corsets and hoops—that they lost all thought of the perfumed little pouches in which they carried their Queen's heads and sixpences. The guilty ones were instantly suspected. No steps, however, were taken to convict and chastise them, although (as the genteel Saunders delicately intimates) no "moral doubt existed in the minds of Sergeants Murphy and Allen of the G division," that the parties suspected were the robbers. Appearances, it seems, did not authorize their arrest. Devout loyalists should look to their pockets in the rapturous moments of their radiant idolatry.

The late Lord Clifford (O'Connell, by-the-by, called him the "prattling peer") was one evening saying his prayers after confession in St. Peter's, in the superb old city of Rome. When he had done, he got up from his knees to go home. But where was his hat? He looked about everywhere. He said a prayer or two to assist him. All to no purpose. The hat was a dream—"an airy nothing"—no one saw it—no one had touched it. My Lord Clifford stepped back to the Confessional, and, drawing aside the curtain, communicated the news of the sudden and mysterious disappearance of his hat to the good priest who sat inside the box. It was Father Glover, one of the most eminent English Jesuits of his time—an old man, full of piety, scholarship, benevolence, and wit.

"I've lost my hat," whispered the Peer.

"What were you doing?" asked the Priest.

"I was praying," replied the nobleman.

"The scripture tells us to watch as well as pray," rejoined Father Glover; and with this admonition he drew the curtain across, and left the bereaved nobleman to meditate on the wisdom of the scriptures.

I meant this anecdote for the benefit of ladies and gentlemen who get into crowds on the heels of a Lord Lieutenant, hurrying up to a regatta, and who lose a trifle or two in the heat and crush of their devotion. But it's loss of time, I fear; and besides that, the police, under Commissioner O'Ferrall, are paid for minding pockets. Indeed, now as I think of it, I feel sick at the thought of having worried my fingers and spoilt half a sheet of ruled foolscap with the nonsense.

Smith O'Brien, I see, has been in Galway. Just for a day, on a visit to some relatives, only. He is, I understand from the local papers which mention it, in the very best health, heart, and looks. As I have nothing better to add—and you could desire nothing better—I disappear for a week, leaving behind me the name of Kilmainham.

THE LAST SURVIVOR OF THE IRISH BRIGADE.

From the Univers.

On the 19th of May a noble life became extinct at Philadelphia, in the United States, in the person of the venerable John Keating, Knight of St. Louis, formerly captain in the regiment of Walsh Serrant, perhaps the last survivor of that brave Irish Brigade which served France during a hundred years. It is well known that after the revolution of 1688 Catholic Ireland remained faithful for several years to King James II., and all the strength of Protestant England, aided by German mercenaries and Marshal Schomberg's French Huguenots, was needed to reduce the brave Jacobites. At the capitulation of Limerick, the Irish army refused to serve the usurper, William of Orange, and preferred to enlist under the banners of Louis XIV., who in their eyes was the champion of Catholicism. Thirty thousand men of this army were shipped to Brittany. They formed that famous Irish Brigade which poured out its blood for kings on every field of battle, and which so particularly distinguished itself an Fontenoy. For a whole century the recruiting of part of these regiments continued from Ireland, in spite of English obstacles, and during the last century emigration attracted the sons of green Erin to France as now it draws them to America.

John Keating, born in Ireland September 19, 1759, was the grandson of Jeffries Keating, who raised a troop of horse during the siege of Limerick, and who, having retired to France with the army of King James, distinguished himself in Spain and Italy under Marshal Catinat. Jeffries' son, Valentine, Baron de Keating, obtained leave to return to Ireland, but finding the penal laws intolerable to Catholics, he returned to France, where he had his sons educated at the Jesuit College at Poitiers. John Keating and three of his brothers entered as officers in the Irish regiment of Walsh Serrant, in the service of France. The regiment was sent to the Antilles during the war of independence of the United States, thence to Pondicherry and the Isle of France. In this last garrison Captain Keating made the acquaintance of Parny and Bernardin de St. Pierre, as he tells us himself. At the revolution he was sent to St. Domingo, where he arrived after a narrow escape from being twice shipwrecked. "There," says M. de Rochefoucauld, "John Keating, having the confidence of all parties, having refused the more seductive proposals of the Commissioners of the Convention, preferred to retire to America without a farthing, rather than remain in wealth and power in St. Domingo by a breach of his first oath. A man of a character at once mild and stern, of distinguished merit, rare intelligence, of uncommon virtue, and unexampled disinterestedness." At the death of Louis XVI., for whom he professed a chivalrous devotion, Captain Keating retired to the United States, and associated there with some thirty families of the French noblesse, and of the military, to found the colony of "Asylum," near Towanda, in Pennsylvania. Some came from France, some from the Antilles, and a certain number of laborers and negroes followed them to their new establishment. As soon as the noblesse could return to France, they hastened to quit the colony—among them Messrs. de Noailles, de Blacons, de Montule, d'Audelot, de Boileau, de la Rone, and de Vilaine; laborers and husbandmen alone remained at Towanda, where at this day, among their descendants, not a single Catholic is to be found—a fatal example of the lot which awaits populations removed from their pastors, and absorbed in the interests of present existence. It is thus that in the United States we saw the faith disappear among the immigrants or their children until the Clergy from France and Ireland became sufficiently numerous to create parishes, wherever, in the interior of the country, they could form a nucleus of a Catholic congregation.

At the dispersion of his friends, Mr. Keating settled in Philadelphia, where he married, and where he has edified whole generations by his charity, his piety, and his virtues. We had the honor of seeing him there in September last; he was celebrating the anniversary of his birth, and the commencement of his 97th year. He was in the enjoyment of all his faculties, and received with gaiety the compliments which the Priests of the town, who were all his friends, came to offer him. But the chief of all was the Bishop of Philadelphia, Mgr. Kendrick, now Archbishop of Baltimore; and when, on the 19th of last May, the almost centenary patriarch slept in the Lord, full of days and merits, Mgr. Kendrick quitted his metropolitan city to celebrate the last rites, and deliver a funeral oration over the deceased.

We believe another branch of the family of Jeffries Keating still inhabits Poitou. The name at least still figures among the Poitou noblesse. It is not the only Irish family among our provincial nobility which has remained equally faithful to the religious and monarchical sentiments of their ancestors.

We have thought it right not to have left unnoticed the death of one of the last representatives of an heroic race. The memory of the Chevalier John Keating commends itself to the reverence of three nations. He belonged to Ireland by birth and religion, to France by his military services, and to America by his virtues.

LETTER FROM JOHN MARTIN.

Rosstrevor, Ireland, 6th August, '56.

My Dear Mitchel—Perhaps the best way in which I can answer the letter of congratulation and condolence which you have addressed to me, in the Citizen and the Irish News, is to repeat the substance of a letter which, immediately on hearing of the amnesty, I wrote and sent for publication in Ireland. You will see that I, too, was apprehensive lest "the favor of the British Government might cast some suspicion on my character;" and that my letter, if published, would have prevented mistakes on the subject. It was only after my return to Ireland (in the beginning of June) that I learned, to my vexation, that my letter had never been published. It is now two months since then, and I have been often and often tormented with the thought that some of the people who greet me with a hearty "Welcome home!" may do so under a serious mistake. I have desired an opportunity for setting the Irish public right as to my sentiments. But you know how reluctant I am to go before the public except upon purely public questions; and you can conceive that I might have remained silent, though choking with vexation, had not your published letter called upon me to speak out. The letter I sent from Paris was dated the 13th of May. Unfortunately I kept no copy of it. But I partly remember the substance of it, and even some of the very words I said:

"Aware that my unchanged patriotic sentiments would be distasteful to the majority of my countrymen now remaining in Ireland, I do not think fit to obtrude them upon the public. I have no present purpose of urging Irishmen to consider the ruinous effects of the English domination upon our unfortunate country. But I want to prevent disagreeable mistakes among such persons as I may meet in society upon my return from exile. And therefore I am anxious to make known beforehand my personal feelings respecting my own return, and respecting my comrades, Messrs. MacManus, Meagher, and Mitchel, who remain under proscript.

My joy at the prospect of going back to meet my family is troubled at the thought that my return is owing to the permission of a British Minister. I never pretended to exercise any influence in Irish public affairs; I lament how puny were those efforts of mine which, eight years ago, the British government met by packing a jury and otherwise perverting the course of justice, in order to put me out of their way. But it was the ability to do my country service that I lacked and not the good will. I did endeavor sincerely and earnestly to perform my duty as an Irishman. I am at least innocent of having wronged or slighted my country in thought, word or deed. And I have never done anything to forfeit my just rights to live in Ireland, enjoying the protection of my country's laws as an honest and inoffensive citizen. So, as it was an outrage for the British government to banish me, it is an insolence for them to treat me as a pardoned criminal whom they graciously permit to return to Ireland.

Yet I shall not scruple to avail myself of their permission, no more than I would scruple to breathe when a robber had relaxed his grip on my throat.

For what regards my comrades and friends, against whom the English Minister has alleged or insinuated a charge of dishonor, as a pretext for excluding them from his amnesty, it is enough for me to say that, as patriot and man of honor, I have no higher ambition than to be ranked with Messrs. McManus, Meagher and Mitchel.

"Before leaving Van Dieman's Land, I publicly repudiated the unworthy distinction in point of honor, which our enemies sought to make against those gentlemen. Mr. O'Brien and Mr. O'Doherty did the same. But as to myself, I declared the fact that I was fully committed in honor with Mr. Mitchel, whom our enemies have accused the loudest. Being so committed, I must not argue that question. Let all who take an interest in it inquire and judge for themselves. But I cannot help confessing that I feel deeply grieved and a little astonished to find that there are any Irishmen of any party, who are disposed to listen to a charge of dishonor, brought by jury-packers and fellow conspirators of Mr. Birch against men who have labored and suffered for Ireland like MacManus, Meagher and Mitchel."

Such was my letter. It seems to me sufficiently explicit. Possibly my anxiety to be explicit may have given to my language an appearance of bitterness and haughtiness that, I think, is not in my nature.

I have been now in Ireland for two months. My hand has been grasped by many a kindly neighbor and friend of old times, and my eyes have looked upon many a dearly-loved scene that I had hardly hoped ever to visit again except in dreams. I am congratulated on all sides upon the present "prosperity" of Ireland. And to those who have witnessed the years of famine, the present condition of the country may well seem prosperity. There is no longer starvation, and the laboring people are able to procure enough of tolerable food, and the number of paupers supported by poor rates has greatly diminished, and beggary and rags are much less remarkable than for many years past. Industry has recovered to a great extent from the effects of the famine, and the desolation, that was then brought upon property of rich and poor that were Irish, is nearly at an end. But I am afraid it is mainly to the recovery of the potato crop that we owe this happy change. For some years past the potato disease has been gradually wearing out, and the farmers and laborers have been profiting by the return of this most valuable of Irish crops.

Yet, delightful as it is to see this comparative prosperity in Ireland, I cannot help remarking that, of all peoples that I have seen or read of, the Irish enjoy the smallest share of their own country's produce. My nation—alas! that I should have it to say—is the shabbiest nation in the civilized world.

Ever your friend, John Martin.

IRISH FISHERIES.

From the London Daily News.

Among many curious and questionable traits which are supposed distinctively to characterise different races, and whose practical influence is traceable in their daily habits and occupations, few have been more frequently noted than the alleged unwillingness of the Irish to engage in seafaring pursuits so long as they can obtain less profitable modes of livelihood. The historical and statistical fact seems to have been long since admitted by all semi-official and other doctrinaires, that the Celt is not an aquatic animal; and there is hardly to be found an exception in the myriads of books of lamentation over Hibernian evils with which we used to be so painfully familiar, wherein a chapter or two was not devoted to groans over uncaught fish, unmanned boats, and unadventurous beachmen, who would starve rather than go to sea in quest of a dinner fit for an alderman. Exeter Hall ascribed it all to Popery and the observance of holidays which invariably fell upon the finest times for deep seafishing. Police politicians, both Whig and Tory, attributed it to Ribbonism and agitation in general which had set the people thoroughly astray. And finally, the ethnologists set down all to the debit side of the account, which they are so good as to keep for all the families of the human race, under the heading of "national idiosyncrasies." The only question that never was raised by any of these profound and pious accountants-general was whether the fact itself were really a fact or not? Had any humane sceptic on the point ventured to insinuate a doubt, he would have been overwhelmed on the spot with imputation of ignorance or a disposition to vain cavilling, if not to a perverse desire of extenuating a notorious and disastrous fault worthy only of inexorable reprobation. Was it not matter of history that Spaniards, and Hollanders, and Norwegians, had paid at various periods for royal leave to fish off the Irish coasts; and had not similar permission been asked by enterprising persons from the United States at the beginning of the present century, while no adequate or efficient steps were taken by the people inhabiting that country to benefit by the advantages lying at their door? It was said by Sir William Temple two hundred years ago that the fisheries of Ireland were "a mine of wealth under water as rich as many of the mines that other people possessed on land," yet neither before nor since his time has this exhaustless mine been worked as it might have been; and it is only now that serious measures seem to be in progress for turning its resources to account. Nevertheless we may be permitted to doubt whether the fact proves the existence of any repugnance towards marine avocations on the part of the poor and hitherto unaided dwellers on the shores of the ocean and the channel; and we rather suspect it will presently appear that under intelligent guidance the hardy and laborious population of the creeks and bays of the Irish coast will become excellent fishermen and good sailors.

The progress of steam communication by sea and land has wholly changed the condition of things in this as in other respects. Heretofore a boat-load of the most valuable fish, when safe landed at some remote village of Mayo, Galway, or Clare, was, to all intents and purposes, worth nothing, sometimes less than nothing, to the poor fellows who had spent their time and labor, and exposed their vessel and her gear to all the wear and tear of rough weather in securing it. For turbot and sole, mackerel and whiting, they were literally without a chance of buyers at any price. The means of rapid transport to a remunerative market did not exist. The stronger flavored portion of their deep sea capture suited their own palates best, and, sooth to say, were more nutritious and suitable as a condiment to the inevitable potato. Save for manure, a large part of their hard-earned prize was utterly valueless; yet dilettanti politicians and fop philanthropists were never weary of expatiating on the inactivity and stupidity of men who stayed at home of stormy nights sooner than go in quest of unsaleable delicacies such as we have described. Now all is changed. Railways when completed throughout the west of Ireland, by equalising the value of all marketable commodities, will create new ideas, wishes, energies, and habits in the inhabitants of the sea-board. It may and will, perhaps, take a little while to make the coming change practically felt. Railway management, like everything else in this money-making world, requires the constant application of the whip and goad of competition. It is stated in a recent pamphlet on the subject, Lieutenant Symons, that while fish is carried from Aberdeen to London, a distance of 500 miles, for £3 per ton, a charge of £2 10s. is made for the same weight of fish on the line from Galway to Dublin, which does not exceed 127 miles. There is only one way of arguing convincingly with railway directors, and that is through their joint stock pockets. The means of doing this, in the case before us will, we apprehend, be found in the gradual use of cheap screw steamers employed to carry or to tow vessels built purposely for the carriage of fresh fish, and fitted up with what are termed "wells" in the hold for the purpose of keeping their valuable freight alive. As regards many kinds of fish that is quite possible even for a voyage of several days, and the use of ice enables the remainder to be almost without fail brought in a state of perfection many hundred miles to our great metropolis market.

The usual half-yearly examination of the pupils at the military schools, Limerick, was held before Mr. Vickers, who has been appointed Head Inspector of Military Schools in Ireland, accompanied by the Assistant Adjutant-General, Colonel Muller, Captain Gilley, Adjutant Depot Battalion, Captain Thompson, 47th Regiment, and some English gentlemen, who accompanied Mr. Vickers on his tour. After the examination had concluded, says the Observer, Mr. Vickers told the officers who accompanied him that he had seen many military schools in England and Ireland, but that he had never seen one at all equal to that in Limerick. The soldiers were trained in history, geography, reading, writing, arithmetic and composition. He said they far exceeded any military classes he had ever before examined, and did infinite credit to Mr. Little's ability and assiduity. The soldiers' children, under the charge of Mrs. Little, head schoolmistress, were then examined, and in their arrangement and answering gave the fullest satisfaction. On Mr. Vickers taking his leave, he remarked that he would not forget representing to the highest military authorities, the highly gratifying and progressive state of the Limerick Military Schools, under the direction of Mr. and Mrs. Little. Every one present seemed entirely to concur in the encomium of the Inspector.

Speaking of Queenstown, the Cork Examiner congratulates Mr. Philip Scott upon his election as Chairman of the Town Commissioners of Queenstown, and the inhabitants of that rising town upon their excellent choice. To the Messrs. Scott, the Examiner says, Queenstown owes much—more than to any other of its enterprising merchants. A single glance at Queenstown as it is, contrasted with Cove as it was, speaks most eloquently the praises of those gentlemen. But much more remains to be done, in order to render that beautifully circumstanced town what it should be. Its sewerage is still an abomination, and that without an excuse. There is not a place for bathing along the whole shore. Passage has its fine plunge bath, and a free access to the river; but Queenstown, to which hundreds and thousands of people go every summer, and for the benefit of sea-bathing, has no further convenience for bathers than a rough strand—which is not always available. Queenstown without accommodation for bathers, the Examiner originally observes, is really the play of Hamlet without the part of Hamlet.

A man named Murphy, who resided a few miles from Macroon, was drowned last April twelve months. At the time it was supposed that his death had been caused accidentally. From some circumstances which have since been brought under the attention of the authorities, the police have been engaged in making inquiries, and the result was an investigation held before the magistrates at Coachford Petty Sessions. After a lengthened inquiry, the Bench decided on committing a family named Manning, the mother, two sons and two daughters, who reside in the neighborhood of Coachford, to await a further investigation.

An inquest has been held before Richard Jones, Esq., Coroner for the Mallow district, Co. Cork, on the body of a man named John Begley. The deceased, a laborer in the employment of the Rev. Mr. Stewart, of Cecilstown, tacked a young horse to a cart, in order to ascertain how far he might rely on his tractability in drawing turf from a bog. The horse became thirsty, and when returning from the bog he suddenly dashed off in the direction of some water that lay near, upset the cart, and killed Begley on the spot. The deceased was thrown violently against a ditch, receiving a wound in the temple that deprived him of speech and life together. The deceased has left a wife and orphans.

The Meander frigate has entered Cork harbor. The day being a brilliant one, and the vessel sailing on a light breeze blowing from the south-east, she was visible for a long distance seawards, and presented a most beautiful appearance. On her way in between the forts, she carried every stitch up to her royals, and, viewed in the front, she towered up in an enormous pyramid of canvas. She sailed directly into her moorings, exactly opposite the Beach, and in a few minutes was at anchor in her berth.

The late fair of Nantenan, county Limerick, is stated to have been even worse than that held the day before at Creagh, a few miles thence. There was no appearance of cattle of any kind, with the exception of three cows. Of the three cows one was bought at £5 out of a joke, but disputed. By the general verdict of all present, it was transferred to the joker, who reluctantly paid for it, and drove off an old bargain—a wiser man going out of the fair than when he came into it.

The Kilkenny Moderator is informed that a shower of black rain, which seemed to have escaped general observation, fell over that city lately. The shower took place in the afternoon of Friday, the 25th July, and, from the specimen preserved, it appears to have been of a more densely sable color than the black rain which excited so much observation and commentary amongst the scientific and curious a few years since.

A splendid lot of seventy fat pigs were observed coming into Waterford into town from the fair of Carlow. They were conveyed by rail, and the drivers said they were fresher at the end of their journey than at the starting. This is a good hint for county Waterford people, who are anxiously looking out for their railway.

At Cork assizes Mr. Justice Jackson and Mr. Coffey complimented the Head Constable on the tact, prudence and ability with which he had managed a case of considerable difficulty, and on the fairness and impartiality with which he had given his evidence.

The Queen has erected the district of Natal, in South Africa, into a separate Colony, to be called "the Colony of Natal, and has appointed John Scott, Esq., to be Lieutenant-Governor of the said Colony. This gentleman is the eldest son of the late Captain John Scott, of Umgola, county Armagh.

H. M. S. Osborne, having on board Mr. C. Wood, Mr. Barclay, and Mr. Bernal Osborne, Secretary to the Lords of the Admiralty, had arrived in Cork harbor. Their lordships are on their annual toar of inspection.

The failure of the Tipperary Bank is said to have done great damage to the early part of this season in Tramore, county Waterford.

Anthony O'Flaherty, Esq., M. P., Knockbane, has been appointed by the Lord Lieutenant and Privy Council a governor of the Ballinasloe Lunatic Asylum.

The Lord Chancellor has appointed Major-General Sir James Chatterton, Bart., a magistrate for the county Tipperary.

The Nation intends giving its readers an exact "coup d'œil," or rather Political Anatomy of the present state of the Irish Representation. Gammon goes down so freely in Ireland, and we are so infernally good natured, says the Nation, that a man must give, what we call bad votes before we can bear to convict him. It is as much as some honest people in the county of Louth can do to make up their minds that Montesquieu Bellew is not an honest man, because, forsooth, he did not vote for the Titles Bill. Almost all Longford, of course, is in ecstasies at Mr. Hughes's divisions, and defies the universe to show a wrong vote he gave. The way your political blackleg hedges his book is by voting what is called right on questions like Maynooth, and Tenant Right, where the government are safe or indifferent—and wrong, as many can be, whenever the government are in jeopardy, or whenever they wish, indeed. Even on an Irish Coercion Bill, a Scully or an O'Connell has to do as Mr. Hayter bids him—and, understanding Lord Palmerston to be against the Pope, has not Papist blood enough in him to resent an insult to his Holiness, which has moved the wrath of the Catholics of the world. Thus, "thanks to the liberal spirit of the present Ministry," and the mean, time-serving tone encouraged by various Irish Archbishops and Bishops, in the body of the Irish Catholics, we have, the Nation concludes, neither respect nor power, are a shame to our ancestors, and a scandal to our age.

A lady, with two lady visitors, went into her garden near Pope's Hill, Cork city, a few days ago. "Come," said she, "until I show you the place where the robbers got in last year." As she spoke there was a rush, and a number of young thieves scampered off, darting through the hedge and over the wall. Another, however, took a different direction, in which he was nimbly pursued by the youngest of the ladies, who soon came up with and seized him. The unfortunate fellow had a bag filled with gooseberries, which, with himself, was taken into custody. A policeman was sent for, by whom he was introduced to the police-office, whence he was sent to prison for eight days, with a private whipping to vary the monotony of confinement. Two nights before he had been in the same garden, his shirt taken off and tied into a bag, and on that occasion he fared so well that he was encouraged to go again.

A party of gentlemen connected with the Irish Farmer's Magazine, visited the Munster Model Farm while attending the Cork Agricultural Show. They were disappointed in finding that nothing whatever had been done towards the erection of suitable buildings, and that, consequently, no pupils had been taken in. The Commissioners of National Education have the power of erecting such. They have received, or are entitled to receive, £4,000 of government money, as well as £400 subscribed by the gentry of Cork, towards their erection; in addition to which a conditional reduction was made in the rent of the farm, by the Duke of Devonshire, provided that within three years an agricultural school would be established. If a really practical school were established in the neighborhood, it would create a taste in the minds of many of the pupils that otherwise would never enter their heads.

The inhabitants of Killarney have presented Father McDonnell, on his departure from amongst them, an address accompanied with a beautifully worked purse containing £140. The deputation, consisting of James O'Connell, J. P., Lakeview; Denis Shine Lawler, J. P., Grenagh; John Morrogh Bernard, D. L., Ardagh; Daniel Cronin Coltsmann, J. P., Glenflesk Castle; John C. O'Reardon, solicitor, Gortroe; Thomas McDonogh, John Brennan, Alexander James McCarthy, solicitor; Charles Aylmer McCarthy, solicitor; Lawrence S. Griffin, M.D., Justin McCarthy, Thomas Finn, John O'Halloran, Richard Linnegar, Daniel O'Callaghan, and Owen C. McDermott, Esqrs., proceeded to the Bishop's residence, where Mr. McDonnell received them.

The Limerick Reporter informs us that a fierce fight has taken place in Clare street, Limerick. The parties engaged in the combat were the Skeehans, the Hyneses, the Coffees and O'Dwyer. They fought with pitchforks, stones, tongs, and every procurable weapon. Blood flowed in torrents between the parties, several of whom were arrested, and are yet in confinement, with the exception of Skeehan, who is said to be in a comfortable position in life.

A correspondent of the Limerick Reporter states that some days ago a man of the name of Patrick Mulqueen was arrested for a debt of upwards of £20, for a bill of costs arising out of transactions in relation to the new Killaloe road, in which he took a nominal part. He was taken off to prison by the Sheriff. In the course of the day Mr. Studdert hearing of the circumstance paid the debt. The correspondent says much credit is due Mr. Studdert for the promptitude with which he paid the amount.

The Kilkenny Moderator is most glowing in its account of the weather and crops. The wheat-fields have assumed the most beautiful golden tint, and the barley and oat crops are also rapidly changing their vernal hues and beginning to wear an autumn aspect. Some few patches of winter oats have already yielded to the sickle, and the harvest will be fit for the reaper fully a week earlier than was calculated upon three weeks since. Potatoes are progressing favorably. On the whole, the harvest prospects are most cheering—so says the Moderator.

The Fair of Elton, county of Limerick, was scantily furnished with stock of any kind. A number of Cork buyers, finding how it was likely to turn out, immediatey took the return train from Kilmallock, and were in full time to be to their liking in the middle of the Fair at Fermoy, held the same day. There was some smart business transacted, but at prices varying little from late quotations.

The Fair of Bruff was well attended. There was a good supply of all kinds of stock, but not as much business done as expected. It was a very large sheep fair, that being the principal business of the day. Lambs up to £1 6s.; yearlings, £4, £5 and £6 each for the best in the field. One prime milch cow brought £17; the ordinary run of the day being £12 to £14.

The Waterford News says, that after the late fire at the Neptune Iron Works in that city, many persons asked—"Was the concern insured?" An advertisement published by the News shows that it was, and also demonstrates the prompt manner in which the demand of £1,400 was met by the National office—an exclusively Irish company—conducted by Arthur Mason, Esq.

It is expected that the cable connecting Newfoundland with Ireland will be laid down during the ensuing year.

The ship Woodstock, of New Ross, the property of the Messrs. Greaves, has landed all her passengers in good health in Quebec.

The Mayo Constitution informs us that the fishermen in Clew-Bay have commenced the herring fishery.

The Kilkenny Moderator understands the postal authorities are about to make an arrangement in the large towns in Ireland, calculated to afford much convenience to persons residing in localities distant from the post offices. "Silent receivers" are to be put up in convenient places in the streets, into which any person may at any time drop properly stamped letters and newspapers, at any time of the day, and officials connected with the post office will remove them from thence for transmission to their destination before the closing of the various mails. An inspector has been in Kilkenny, making arrangements for this purpose.

Copies of information and warrants against Mr. James Sadleir, M. P., and of the bills of indictment, have been printed by order of the House of Commons, on motion of Mr. Roebuck. There is a copy of a bench warrant issued by the Lords Justices of Assize at Clonmel, on the 18th of July, for the apprehension of Sadleir for conspiracy to defraud the English shareholders and depositors of the Tipperary Joint Stock Bank of large sums of their money. There is also a warrant out against him signed by H. W. Thompson, Justice of the Peace in the South Riding of Tipperary.

On the 1st of January, 1851, the number of prisoners in jail in Ireland was 10,084; in 1852, 8,803; in 1853, a further reduction to 7,604; a still greater reduction in 1854, the number being 5,955; while on the 1st January there were but 3,561. The number charged with serious offences in the last year was inconsiderable as compared with any previous year. There was a large increase in the number of prisoners charged with violating the revenue laws, one of the consequences of the great augmentation in the spirit duties.

Several persons have complained to us of the neglected state of Bilberry road. The wall erected by Mr. Philip Flemming is an excellent piece of work, and we regret that his labors were not extended farther. We have met several drunken persons on this road. Why is this? We are, however, sure that Head Constable Connolly and his men of the Bridge-street station, will keep a vigilant eye over the Bilberry-road.—Waterford News.

The following circumstance, says the Limerick Reporter, does eternal honor to the Protestants of Tipperary. The Catholics there have been for some years making a subscription to build a new chapel, and had a sum of £2,000 collected for the purpose, which was lodged in Sadleir's bank, and, of course, met the fate of many similar lodgments. The Protestants have set a subscription on foot to replace the lost fund, and they have a good instalment of it already collected.

The very Rev. Dr. M'Donough, of the diocese of Kingston, Canada, who some few months ago came to Ireland for the purpose of getting some of the "Sisters of Mercy" to have a branch of their institution established in the parish of Perth, has succeeded in his mission, as he expects to return accompanied by six nuns from Galway in a few weeks.

The public examinations for the year 1856, of the Clonmel District Model National School, were held at the school on Wednesday. The room selected for the occasion was festooned with laurels. There was a numerous assemblage of ladies. T. Sheehan, Esq., Head Inspector, and E. McCreanor, Esq., District Inspector, were also in attendance.

The Right Rev. Dr. Ryan has visited the ancient town of Kilmallock, to receive the contributions of the Very Rev. Dr. Downes and the people of the Parish, in aid of the New Cathedral of St. Johns. Nothing could surpass the enthusiasm that prevailed. The contributions were most generous.

A gentleman of the highest respectability has informed the Limerick Observer that he saw, for the third time, what appears from his description to be the long expected comet of 1556, the re-appearance of which this year has been so long foretold.

A meeting of the Friends of the People newspaper was lately held in the Town Hall, Wexford, at which it was unanimously agreed that an appeal should be made to the priests and people of the county for the purpose of sustaining that journal against the attempt lately made to crush it.

The Rev. P. Moore, late Administrator of the parish of Killeen, near Spiddal, county of Galway, has been promoted to the parish of Athenry, in the same county, by his Grace the Most Rev. Dr. MacHale, Archbishop of Tuam.

The Rev. Charles M'Loughlin, O. S. F., has died at his father's residence, Glenfarn, county Leitrim, at the early age of twenty-six years. He was nephew to the Rev. F. M'Loughlin, guardian to the Franciscan Convent, Willow-bank, Ennis.

From all parts of the country, the Waterford News says, there are most cheering accounts daily as to the progress of the crops. No one ever remembered a finer season. A superabundant harvest is expected about Waterford.

In many of the gardens round Ennis indications of the potato blight are observed. At present the ravages of the disease are confined to the foliage—though occasionally a black potato may be found on digging the crop. This we give on the testimony of the Clare Journal.

The Cork Constitution mentions a splendid specimen of Fluke Kidney Potatoes, grown by Captain Roberts, at Kilmoney, Corrigaline. Three of these potatoes weighed 2lbs. The produce is most extraordinary, averaging eight or nine to each stalk.

The directors of the Waterford and Limerick Railway have given an excursion trip from Waterford to Limerick. The citizens of Waterford largely availed themselves of it, and along the line the number of pleasure-goers was considerably augmented. The arrangements on the line were carried out to perfection.

The wheat and barley were never, in the memory of man, finer, but the Limerick Observer, which says this, says that too much cannot be said of oats, which this season come forward with a short stunted ear, and no straw.

Baron Pennefather, nearly twenty years since, became the purchaser of an estate in Tipperary, which had been greatly reduced in value by illegal combination amongst the occupiers, and the exceeding difficulty of collecting rents. The estate was considered one of the most turbulent localities in the whole County. The Baron, after close inquiry, discovered that the evils were mainly attributable to the system of gross mismanagement on the part of the former proprietor and his agent, which deprived the tenantry of all legitimate inducement to industry, and left them without the shape of interest in their holdings or in the general welfare of the property. The new proprietor at once adopted a different system—he struck off arrears of rent that had accumulated—assisted the embarrassed tenants to crop and improve their land—infused a new spirit of enterprise amongst them; and the result was, confidence was soon re-established—the estate, instead of being a disgrace to the district, soon became remarkable for orderly conduct and tranquil industry, and a model to the surrounding country for improved husbandry. A statement to this effect was made by the baron to the Grand Jury of Tipperary several years since, when he availed himself of the opportunity of urging upon the gentry of that county—at a moment too, when Tory peers and magistrates were vehemently demanding from the Government Coercion and Insurrection Acts—the duty and the wisdom of following the simple plan by which he had succeeded in converting an estate productive of nothing but crime into a valuable property.

With regard to the potato crop the Cork Examiner has had information from the districts of Kenmare, Bantry, Skibbereen, Millstreet, Clonakilty and Bandon. Between Cork and the latter town it appears every thing is promising. Between Clonakilty and Bandon, however, there is considerable evidence of blight to be seen. In the neighborhood of the town of Kenmare the crop is quite healthy, but between that and Bantry evidences of disease have appeared. About Bantry there are no indications whatever of blight, while between that town and Skibbereen, and in the immediate neighborhood of Skibbereen, considerable manifestations of disease have appeared. About Millstreet nothing could be finer than the appearance of the crop.

An inquest has been held by R. Byrne, Esq., coroner, at the Ballymascanlon constabulary station, near Newry, on the bodies of four persons who met their death while bathing, at a place called Aughavoys, between Mount Pleasant, the residence of Sir John M'Neil, and the harbor of Dundalk. From the evidence of Bernard Hagan, the only witness examined at the inquest, it appeared that he was bathing at the same time with the deceased, and soon after heard an alarm given by some boys, upon which he hastened up, but the four had disappeared. They rose no more. He saw the four bodies afterwards, and recognized them as the bodies of Phillip M'Dermot, aged about 30, who had beene gardner to Sir John M'Neil for upwards of twelve years; James Bennett, of Proleek, aged 17; Matthew Feran, of Mount Pleasant, aged 15; and Michael Hanlon, of Mount Pleasant, aged 12.

O'Connell, the Wexford Guardian reminds us, used to call Galway the fag-end of Ireland, and William Keogh would appear to be quite "to the manor born." There was one time when we had a decent respect for the West—that was, when the enemies of our country considered Connaught synonymous with a certain warm place, about which it is to be hoped they'll know no further than the name—but now it has become the fruitful hot-bed for the production of those adventurers who thank heaven they have got a country to sell. The only thing that tells in Galway is "gammon," and his lordship was accordingly affected to tears, when he passed in review the reminisciences of his boyhood, studiously omitting, however, that childish freak, when he swore and was foresworn, and as a consequence became the ermined judge.

The readers of one of the Wexford papers are favored with an interesting description of a splendid sample of new wheat, grown on the lands of Sion by Francis Leigh, Esq. He calls it "Quin White Wheat," having procured the seed from Mr. Quin, of Bray. It has six rows in each head, and the straw is very strong, and stands nearly six feet high. Mr. Quin had fourteen barrels to the acre last year; but Mr Leigh expects twenty barrels to the acre this year, an expectation, to all appearances, in which he will not be disappointed. It was sown broad-cast on potato ground, and with only nineteen stone of seed to the acre.

A trustworthy correspondent in Bonmahon supplies the Waterford News with the following facts regarding the proselytising establishments at Bonmahon, viz.: There were in the infant school last year one hundred and nine children; at present it contains but ten. The embroidery school at the beginning of this year contained forty-six persons, at present there are but thirteen in it. The printing establishment is also falling into decay, there being but a few persons only occasionally employed in it. These are well-known proselytising establishments. They held out for a long time, but at length they are on their last legs.

The Westport Independent says the weather is all that can be desired for harvest work. The Tawny oats are nearly all cut, and barley and wheat have yielded to the sickle. The scythe is used by many instead of the old fashioned reaping-hook, and practised hands use it to great advantage and good effect. The green crops are very thin, but look healthy. There are some complaints of a decay in the potato roots, but not very general. The potato for the past ten years has not produced so many seed apples as this, which is considered a happy promise of returning health. This is the pleasant report of the Independent.

There has been a great excursion of the Westport townsfolk in the Usk steamer, to Kilmore. The boat passed down close by the coast, till near the Saltees, when she veered out and went through the Sound, affording a close view of the Islands. The excursionists were met by a number of boats from Kilmore, who accompanied them to the pier, where they were warmly greeted.—Wexford Independent.

The Londonderry Standard states that preliminary operations have been begun for the construction of the contemplated railway between Lough Foyle and Swilly, terminating in the first instance at Farland Point. The intention, we believe, is to extend this line eventually to Letterkenny, and thus to open up a communication between the city of Derry and the entire county of Donegal.

The weather, says the Newry Examiner, has been tropically hot, and people are as effectually kept within doors by it as they would be by bad weather. The wheaten crop is already assuming a yellow hue, and oats will be ready for the sickle in a few days. The present promises to be one of the finest and most abundant harvests with which the country was ever blessed.

Mr. Abbot, Coroner, from Nenagh, accompanied by Doctor Langer Carey, of Newport, has lately held an inquest on the body of John O'Brien, of Munna, aged 14 years. The poor boy, who was an orphan, was riding on a creel of turf with the owner, a man named McNamara, when he came near a house where a brother and sister of his are lying sick of fever; he jumped down, and his clothes were caught by the pins of the creel; he came down head foremost; his head came under the wheel of the car, which passed over him, breaking the spine of the neck, which caused instantaneous death.

On last Thursday fortnight, a number of navvies on the Belfast and County Down Railway, struck for higher wages and a shorter day. At present their wages are 10s per week. All assembled in a body opposite the residence of the contractor, Mr. Moore, at Tonaghnieve House, Saintfield. Mr. Moore remonstrated with them in vain. Head Constable Phelan, of the Saintfield Constabulary, succeeded in arresting the principal leader, a man named Blain, whom he lodged in Downpatrick jail. The men have had the good sense, the Down Recorder says, to return to their work. All is quiet at present.

C., from Roundstone to Milltown; Rev. M. Brennan, R. C. C., from Milltown to Killmena; Rev. J. McEvily, R. C. C., from Kilmeena to Newport; Rev. J. Loftus, to Moore, &c.

The town of Fermoy, which has become the great military station for the South of Ireland, begins to realize the disadvantage of its isolated position. A project has been set on foot to get a branch railway to Carrigtwohill, thus to secure deep water at Queenstown, for military purposes, and rapid intercourse with the city of Cork. Nearly £20,000 have been already subscribed.

The annual celebration of the "Feast of St. Mary of Angels," took place at the Franciscan Church, Henry street, Limerick, on Sunday last. From distances varying from twenty to sixty miles, thronged immense numbers of the faithful, many of them poor and aged, whose knowledge of the festival lived only in the traditions of their several localities.

Since the accession of Sir Benjamin and Lady Chapman to the property, they have not been unmindful of the maxim that "property has its duties as well as its rights." Sir Benjamin, as a landlord and employer, has clearly demonstrated that he is a practical supporter of Tenant Right, and one who has at heart the interest of his people.

IRISH REGIMENTS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE.

From the Dublin Freeman.

Though the 77th is called the East Middlesex, and therefore included among the English regiments, it is right to observe that it is composed principally of Irishmen, having been largely recruited in this country before the war, and since the war, by frequent drafts from the same source. We find complete confirmation of this in the list of non-commissioned officers and soldiers belonging to the gallant 77th—who on the day of Inkermann fought side by side with the heroic 88th—decorated with the Legion of Honor. Seven names out of the regiment were selected for distinction, and of these, four are unquestionably Irishmen. We are not sure of Alexander Wright, Murdoch Charleston, and William Wilson; but of James Tuohy, Thomas M'Gill, William Maguire, and John Quinlan, there can be no doubt. The services of these brave fellows are worthy of commemoration. Color Sergeant Tuohy served throughout the war with great gallantry. He particularly distinguished himself on the night of the 19th of April, at the capture of the Rifle Pits, where he was severely wounded. M'Gill, drummer, served throughout the war, and was first in the Rifle Pits, where he made a Russian bugler prisoner. Maguire, private, distinguished himself at the Pits and at Inkermann; and Quinlan was conspicuous for his bravery on these occasions, as well as both attacks on the Redan. The 77th, then, though nominally English, is really Irish. We may add that every non-commissioned officer and soldier of the 88th who received the Legion of Honor was an Irishman. We give their names and services:

"Stephen Conyngham, sergeant major (1,827). Took a very active part in the attack on the Quarries on 7th June, 1855, and was recommended a medal and £5 on that occasion, but could not get it, the regiment having received the allotted number. Noted at the Horse Guards.

"Hubert Kelly, color-sergeant, No. 2 company (1,795). Very distinguished conduct on the 8th of September, 1855, in going out of the advanced trench under a very heavy fire, and bringing in the body of Color-Sergeant Gilmore, who was lying mortally wounded some distance in front.

"Maurice Canty, color-sergeant, No. 4 company (2,538). Volunteered to form one of the attacking party ordered against 'Egerton's Pit,' on the 12th of April, 1855, as also several other occasions. Was present and did duty during the whole campaign.

"Michael Ryan, private, No. 6 company (3,249). Distinguished himself on the 8th September, 1855, in bringing in his officer, Captain Beresford, who was very severely wounded. Present during the whole campaign, and constantly at his duty.

Bernard M'Namara, private, No. 7 company (1,984). Was a sharpshooter at the beginning of the siege, and recommended for a medal for distinguished service, in December, 1854, but did not receive it, as he was invalided to Scutari.

"Thomas Handley, private, grenadier company (2,020). Distinguished himself about the night of August 14, 1855, when some young sentries were disposed to retire before a body of Russians, by forcing them back to their posts, and remaining out himself all night close to a Russian pit.

"Henry Spellacy, private, light company (1,424). A sharpshooter. On October 22, 1855, wounded and made a Russian officer prisoner. Volunteered on all occasions."

With reference to these regiments at the recent review at Aldershott, the Times says:

"Only three of the regiments among the newly arrived troops require special notice—the 42d Highlanders, 77th and 88th regiments. The first named—the long famous 'fighting forty-twa'—lost but few men in the East, and scarcely any from the casualties of war, for the events of the campaign prevented their participating in any of the great struggles save the battle of Alma. The regiment, therefore, is but little changed in material, and is still about the best drilled in our service. Their companies marched past her Majesty with the evenness and solidity of little walls—not a man an inch before or behind the precise line. In executing this manœuvre, they excel in appearance and equal in discipline the famous marching of the household troops. The 88th and 77th suffered most severely in the late war, 75 per cent. of the number that left England having been killed or died of disease. At the battle of Inkermann, the 88th, out of 230 men in action, lost 117 men and officers killed and wounded—a greater loss in proportion to numbers than was sustained by any other corps on that bloody day. It was the bayonet charge of the 77th and 88th that recaptured the four English guns taken by the Russians. Both gallant corps marched well past the Queen, and the latter regiment showed that it wants but little drill to make it, as of old, the famous Connaught Rangers, who, in every quarter of the world, have done more to uphold the reputation of the British arms than almost any other corps in the service."

Answers to Correspondents.

An old friend from Baltinglass, Co. Wicklow, begs us not to leave Patrick O'Donohue out of our Recollections. We certainly shall not. With our warm-hearted correspondent we perfectly agree. Though far from being well educated, O'Donohue cherished a strong love for the beauties of literature, and oftentimes criticized admirably the poetry and rhetoric of Young Ireland. His humor was immense. We might easily fill a column with the specimens of it, every one of them bright as an Irish diamond, though many of them were as coarse. One time, in Van Diemen's Land, he was lying quite ill. He was about quitting his old lodgings for new ones. Being unable to look after them himself, he begged an acquaintance of his, a Frenchman (I forget his name), to furnish them for him. The Frenchman was delighted with the commission. He went and ordered the richest carpeting, the richest curtains, the richest China-ware, the richest bedstead and chairs. The first day O'Donohue was able to get out, he walked with the Frenchman (a fragile, thin-waisted, thin-blooded scamp) to inspect his new lodgings. It would be no easy task to describe his astonishment on mounting the stairs, and casting his eye on the luxurious appointments and furniture which his republican friend (he used to sing the Marsellaise and swear by Couthon) had during his sickness so prodigally ordered and so gracefully arranged. O'Donohue, as he looked from the carpet to the sofa, and from the sofa to the curtains, and down from the curtains to the footstools, and from the footstools up to the end of the bell-ropes, was utterly bewildered. As if through an enchanted palace, led by a spirit, he passed without saying a word, breathless almost, and utterly speechless. At last he broke silence. He couldn't stand it any longer.

"What the deuce is all this for?" he shouts.

"Oh! 'tis veery nice, mon ami, all in de style of Louis Quatorze," the Frenchman sweetly and winningly replied.

O'Donohue's eyes glared. He knitted his eye-brows, clenched his teeth, and smacked his lips, but he didn't say a word. From the sitting-room they passed into the bed-room. There, too, was the same wealth of chintz, mahogany, gilding, carpeting, glass ornaments, satin fluting, embroidered cushions, and fire-screens. O'Donohue stood petrified at the sight of it all. Was that the bed he was to sleep in? It was such as an Emperor or Duchess might have given ducats to own. He looked fiercely all round—looked at the Frenchman—looked again at the bedstead, with its purple and white draperies, enormous plump pillows, and massive needle-worked counterpane. O'Donohue looked again at the Frenchman, screwed his eyes into him, shook his head, growled inwardly, and verged towards a curse. He moves closer to the bed, kicks a basin out from under it, and sends it spinning, like a humming-top, about the room. It was of the purest white, with a blue border, and speckled with lilies in cream color.

"Is that, too," growled O'Donohue, still looking at the Frenchman from under his eye-brows—"is that, too"—and the basin kept spinning all the while—"is that, too," he growled out," in the style of Lewy Quatorze, mon ami—my owld lad?"

"Certainment, mon ami, e'vry ting is of a piece—all in the style of Louis Quatorze."

"Be me sowl," shouts O'Donohue, catching the basin and swinging it round, "I've a mind to smash it on your head in the style of Brian Boru."

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1856.

PERSONALITIES AND POLITICS—RELIGION AND POLITICS—LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE—FREEDOM FOR FREMONT.

Of all the incidents which attract public attention in our days, there is none perhaps of more real importance, not only to this nation, but to all mankind, than the choice of a man to guide for a time the action and express the will of this American People.

Year after year, the weight of this confederacy is more and more felt in the consideration of all the political and social questions that employ thoughtful minds all over the world—year after year her commerce spreads its influence farther abroad, her Literature speaks with a voice, growing year by year more audible and authoritative. This nation has become a Power, soon to be the first Power among the nations; and whatever its People do or say—what manner of men they choose to represent them, and by what marks and qualifications they are guided in their choice, are of interest to all men who look to the Future of Humanity.

But to all of us whom Fate has placed under the protection of this Republic—to those who have been born Americans, not more than to those whom its ever hospitable invitations have accepted as Citizens, these questions involve solemn duties, the responsibility of which, not all the leading articles, not all the eloquent orations of the day, nor all the torch-light harangues which make the night hideous, can exaggerate or absolve us from.

And yet the man that is chosen for President seems to us a question of even less importance, than the class of qualities—the traits of character in the Candidate—which influence and govern the choice.

Whoever be elected, by his concurrence or in spite of him, the nation will surely fulfill its destiny, and, with or without Dignity and Order, march forward on its appointed course; but by the qualities, which the American people admire in their Politicians and consider worthy of praise and honor—by the standard they use to measure virtue or demerit, by the qualities they esteem or condemn, their own character and tendencies are displayed, and by the sort of President they elect, the nature of the Electors is made known.

On this account, we have watched the progress of this Presidential Campaign; and the various discussions on the merits or shortcomings of the three Candidates now in the field. The ingenious devices employed by the advocates of each to elevate their own Chief and degrade the others, acquire in this regard a deeper interest, and we have learnt to consider as serious and important, investigations which, under other circumstances, we should be apt to dismiss from our thoughts as trivial or impertinent or repulsive.

Until of late, we should not have much troubled ourselves to know whether Mr. Buchanan was married or single. Now, we perceive the importance of the question. Celibacy, it seems, is disapproved of by a considerable section of the American People, and the friends of the great Democrat in alarm publish in his defence a story of his early love and sorrow, so touching and pathetic, as to insure for him pardon from the most inveterate Polygamist.

Bachelors for the future, who aspire to political honors, will take the lesson to heart, and strive to win the abiding love of woman's heart, before they dare to plead for the high office at the hands of the People.

The Partizans of the other two candidates strive, each to fix on the character of the opposing candidate an accusation, which it appears from the pertinacity of the discussion, would, if proved, amount to a complete disqualification.

This accusation—this damning blot not to be eradicated or overlooked, is, in fact, adherence to a complicity with the tenets of the Roman Catholic Church.

The Fillmore men first allege against Fremont that he is an avowed Catholic—or, if not avowed, then a Catholic by secret and by stealth—or, if neither, then at least, that he permitted a Catholic priest to pronounce his nuptial benediction. To this, the Fremonters answer that their chief is free from all taint of that baleful superstition; and that, if indeed he did consent to be married by so disreputable an official, it was more his misfortune than his fault—the result of overruling and inevitable necessity—because no other minister was at hand—because the case was urgent and imperative, and delays in such matters are proverbially dangerous.

They then proceed to carry the war into the enemy's Camp, and charge the "great Know-Nothing" with the Papistry of his mother, and state the overwhelming fact, that his sister for a while consented to inhale the polluted atmosphere of a Catholic convent, and even sit at the knees of Catholic nuns.

The Fillmore Camp, all aghast at these horrible disclosures, shelters itself for a while behind a rampart of virtuous indignation, and calls all Humanity to join it in abhorence of this desecration of the bones of Fillmore's deceased relatives. They say moreover that, if indeed, in her early years, the young lady in question did trust her morals within the unhallowed precincts of a convent, it was only for a short time, and merely in order to acquire a smattering of harmless Italian.

How much farther the edifying controversy has gone or may go, what farther startling revelations regarding the ancestors of these distinguished gentlemen may still remain to harrow our souls with fear and wonder, time alone can tell. The last we heard of it was from the correspondent of a New England journal, who asserts that Fremont and a dignitary of the obnoxious Church were some Sundays ago seen staggering arm in arm, both overcome with liquor, on their return from some Popish ceremony, and that in their devious progress, they came in contact with and upset some rods in length of the writer's fence—a statement, the accuracy of which one may, without incurring the charge of excessive incredulity, be excused for receiving with some grains of doubt.

All this to be sure is pitiful trash—transparent falsehood or sheer nonsense, by which one might suppose only the weakest and most gullible natures could be deceived; and yet, there is in it a serious significance, when we remember that they who make and repel these charges—they who invent impossible fictions to cheat the simple and credulous, are men trained in American politics—intimately acquainted with the prejudices and motives of the American People, and that they write and talk and lie on the assumption, which no one seems to question, that to be a Roman Catholic, or even to have any leaning towards the Roman Catholic creed, is in the eyes of Americans a stain and a hurt to the character of any man who seeks an honorable office at their hands.

In this assumption we begin to fear these organs of public opinion are but too correct. There have been of late too many indications that this unreasonable and ignorant prejudice prevails amongst us, and surely the fact cannot fail to oppress all liberal and cultivated minds with melancholy thoughts and forebodings.

Can it be that, change constitutions, forms of government, laws, as we may, superstition and fanaticism are inherent and ineradicable in the nature of man?

In other countries, where sectarian animosity has been for ages warmed into mischievous vitality, fostered and encouraged for Political purposes and under the sanction of the law—where sect has been educated and trained for generations to war against sect, in order that by their divisions the many should be more easily weakened, subdued and controlled to the interests of the few, the existence of fanaticism is explicable. We shudder at the malicious ingenuity by which so hateful a conspiracy was contrived, and pity the folly and weakness of the dupes who are ready to bury in each others' heart the weapons they should, with one combined effort, use against the common foe.

But that such a disease should exist here—that in the United States, where no one system of Religion, equipped and endowed by the state, enlists and supports a standing army of Bigots to harass and subdue Dissent—here, where in the eye of the Law men are free to believe and worship as they please, or not to believe and refuse to worship, if it like them better—here, where men flying from Religious persecution at home professed to seek freedom, and to build up a state where freedom should be permanent and universal—that here in the United States, public opinion should of itself, without any incitement or cause, build up barriers between citizen and citizen—and industriously go in quest of the weapons of its own destruction, is a fact so miserable and unaccountable, that it almost compels us to the melancholy conviction that our nature is inherently and incorrigibly depraved.

Most strange, too, is the selection made of an object of aversion.

All the various forms of Protestant tenets are accounted orthodox. A man may be Methodist, Unitarian, Quaker, Shaker, Mormon, Infidel, without incurring censure or insult—nay, he may build a temple to Buddha, or set about burning the body of his wife as a part of his religious system, and society looks on with mere curiosity, or mildly rebukes the unusual exhibition; but if he happen to worship the God of the Christians in the form adopted by the whole Christian world for beyond fourteen hundred years—in the form adopted by the overwhelming majority of believers in Christianity to-day—he becomes a subject of suspicion, and if he raises his head high enough to attract popular notice, of aversion too. The Historian, in tracing the progress of the society under whose forms and habits we live, cannot fail to see that by the influence of this Catholic church, that society was formed, consolidated, guided, educated and refined. This is an old story, which each will read with what lights he has. But surely any man of ordinary common sense, whose mind is not so narrowed and blinded by fanaticism that he cannot see what is doing around him to-day, must treat with pity or contempt that vain and ignorant prejudice which would place a ban upon all men who believe and worship in that creed and form which the greatest, most intelligent and most civilized nations on this earth to day venerate and adhere to.

France, with her skill in all the arts that beautify and embellish life, with her pre-eminence in science, her heroism and disciplined energy in war—with all her opulence of vigorous life—France is Catholic.

Russia, our rival in rapidity of growth, is dissociated only by an article of church discipline from the communion of the Roman Catholic faith.

Millions of our fellow citizens of different races and languages love and follow that time-honored creed. Its missionaries travel over every land. The sound of its concert-bells is heard by the brook of Kedron, by the Tiber, the Rhone, the Shannon and the Mississippi. Its Sisters of Charity walked on their errand of mercy through the carnage of Sebastopol and the pestilent hospitals of Norfolk. A system so grand and comprehensive—so readily adapting itself to the necessities of mankind—so venerable in its antiquity, and yet displaying such unimpaired vigor and life to-day, should be, to thoughtful minds, the object at least of interest and respect. But America does not as yet take time to think for herself. She imports books and thoughts with her dry goods, ready manufactured by her Anglo-Saxon cousins, and servilely wears and adopts the Foreign article.

In this way she has caught the "No Popery" mania. England has good reasons for the cry. She hates Catholicism and Catholics with good cause, for we always hate what we have plundered and wronged and sought to kill, and are ready to find an excuse for spoliation in the vices of our victim. England therefore cries "No Popery" with all the might of her brazen lungs, and sends here to propagate her bigotry sleek evangelists in white neckcloths, or insane mountebanks with brass trumpets, as the case may require, and Americans open their ears to the poisonous balderdash, and we in imitation of our Anglo-Saxon cousins shout "No Popery" as lustily as if we had been, like them, well paid for our trouble.

When will Protectionists find a Tariff to save us from the overstock of foreign opinions which glut our markets and prevent the growth of the article at Home?

When shall we learn to manufacture for ourselves our own likings and aversions—to think of men and things as we find them?

When shall America get clear of the domination of a foreign mind? Time will tell. But when she does at last awake to independent thought, her people will learn, that their aversion to the old creed of Christendom was foolish, wrong-headed and mischievous—abhorrent as well to their own true and generous instincts as to the genius and institutions of the nation, that a man's fitness or unfitness to fill the highest office in the state, is to be tested, not so much by the creed he professes, but by the courage, fidelity, wisdom, and disinterested love of his country he evinces in the action of his life.

THE NENAGH RIOTS.

It appears that some of our readers are greatly surprised at the silence we have observed respecting these riots. They expected a strong article or two on the subject, full of patriotism, eloquence and hope. Simply chronicling what takes place in Ireland won't satisfy these gentlemen. No news is palatable to them without its inflammatory comment. They must have every item swimming in strong spirits, and the spirits on fire. Snap-dragon, all the year round, is the only game they delight in.

We are sorry it is so, for it will not, we fear, be in our power to gratify their taste. We have no disposition to exaggerate such events. We consider it dishonest to do so. Attaching undue importance to local and partial outbreaks in Ireland—coloring them extravagantly, so that they may look like revolutions—this is to excite hopes which eventuate in the bitterest disappointment. Easily roused, the Irish race pass at times from the deepest despondency to the wildest rapture with the rapidity of lightning. Of the thousands of the race living in America this is particularly true.

Away from the deadening influences of English opinion, fashions, government and institutions—filled with the spirit of liberty, in every sense improved and strengthened by it—from one end of the Republic to the other, they leap with joy whenever any good tidings speed to them from Ireland. Should those tidings promise an armed movement in favor of the Independence of that country, the enthusiasm of Irishmen in America knows no bounds. It is a generous, daring, prodigal enthusiasm. Thousands upon thousands of dollars are subscribed. Hundreds of brave young fellows pledge life and limb to the cause. The ordinary business of life is thrown aside. The pursuit of fortune, pleasure, fame—every thing is abandoned. The poorest laborer in the city gives his day's wages to aid the struggle. He goes home to the garret or the cellar, and tells his poor wife and children he has done that instead of buying them the loaf they hunger for. Their eyes light up. God be praised! Such is their glad cry. They forget their rags and hunger in their love of the old land.

All this, and more than this, is true of the Irish in America. Their devotion to Ireland in 1848 remains on record—never to be effaced—never to be spoken but with the proudest voice. A nature capable of such devotion should not be recklessly taxed. It is a crime—the blackest and deadliest of all crimes—to deceive it.

Such being the feelings that animate and guide us, we prefer to be thought tame and spiritless—prefer to be read out of revolutionary meetings altogether—than write a word which should irrationally excite. Nothing is easier than to be vehement and ferocious on paper. A sanguinary editorial, punctuated with bayonets, is the easiest of all others to throw off. Appeals to revolutionary passions, visions of glory, vows of vengeance, cost very little brain, and require no facts or conscience to sustain them, and can be multiplied by the column, week after week, without a ray of genius, a throb of patriotism, or a grain of common sense.

MATHEMATICAL DISCOVERY.

We cheerfully give the following letter as prominent a position as it is in our power to confer:

LANSINGBURGH, N. Y., August 23d, 1856.

DEAR SIR,—I beg leave to trespass on your time while I am informing you that I have discovered THE TRISECTION OF AN ANGLE, which was deemed impossible, but which I can now assert as possible. It has been tested by some clergymen, who profess to have a good knowledge of mathematics. They found that it was both practically and theoretically correct. There is no doubt about the matter. The solution is so simple that the correctness of the work is self-evident.

But you are aware that there is a large reward for the discovery. I have the discovery, and as a poor Irishman I would ask advice from you. What would be the proper means, or course to adopt, so as to obtain the reward offered, both by Maynooth College and the Government of England.

You have been the Irishman's friend, and I therefore trust you will now be mine, as I am an Irishman, and a friendless one in America. I showed the proposition to the Rev. Thomas M'Laughlin, New Rochelle; Rev. Father Colye, Jersey City; Rev. Father Dowling, Port Chester; Rev. Father Cullinier, Fort Schuyler, Albany; and many others,—some of whom saw the correctness of the solution, while others of them no more than knew that such a proposition was talked of. But all were willing to give their advice as to what course I should pursue, and the majority of their voices was to acquaint you of it, and act as you would direct. Now, sir, if you lend me your assistance, and I get rewarded for the solution of the problem—which has cost me three years' labor—I will recompense you for your trouble. You can answer me through the columns of the Irish News, or address John G. Keenan, Lansingburgh, N. Y., care of Mr. Timothy O'Driscoll. Your obedient servant,

JOHN G. KEENAN, School Teacher.

We print our correspondent's letter, as the best method of attracting the attention of the parties indicated to the discovery announced; and we shall feel proud to further his object by every means in our power. If success and fortune attends Mr. Keenan's scientific labors, we shall feel sufficiently recompensed in having facilitated the means by which Irish intellect achieves wealth and reputation, and thereby adds honor to the race.

As to the simplest and surest way to forward Mr. Keenan's interest, without his personal appearance in Europe, we beg to say that, if entrusted with the document necessary to prove the discovery, Mr. Meagher will forward the same to his father, with a request that he will undertake to lay it before the College of Maynooth, and also draw the attention of the British Government to its merits. This we have no doubt Mr. Meagher, Senior, will willingly and joyfully fulfil.

MR. VERE FOSTER TO THE IRISH-AMERICAN CLERGY.

Mr. Vere Foster, of Wimbledon Common, England, being engaged in the collection of materials for a new edition of his Emigrant's Guide, and in the collection of subscriptions in aid of the emigration of industrious poor persons of good character, chiefly young women, from Ireland to the United States and Canada, is most anxious to obtain reliable information from all parts of the country respecting the prospects of emigrants, and especially the co-operation of the Irish American clergy in the direction of selected emigrants to desirable localities, and to respectable situations.

Of the Emigrant's Guide, 280,000 copies have been already circulated. The amount of subscriptions received from 3,224 persons, rich and poor, amounts to $3,575, exclusive of Mr. F.'s own contribution of $3,000.

Amongst the subscribers are the following persons, well known by reputation to the general public. Viscount Palmerston, Prime Minister of England, and Lady P.; Earl of Carlisle, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Viscount Canning, Governor-General of India, and Lady C.; Earl of Elgin, Ex-Governor-General of Canada; Earl of Ripon, formerly Prime Minister of England, and Lady R.; Earl Granville; Lady Noel Byron; Right Honorable Mr. Sydney Herbert, and Mrs. S. H.; the Rev. P. Quaid, P.P.; Duke of Devonshire; Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury; R. K. Swift, Brother, & Johnston, of Chicago; Lucretia Mott; Horace Greeley; Henry Barnard.

The number of emigrants hitherto sent, chiefly from county Clare and county Louth, Ireland, has been 199 women and 39 men, total 238, of whom 97 were sent previous to 1855, 13 in 1855, and 128 in 1856. The remittances known to have been received from 80 of these emigrants by their relatives in Ireland amount to $5,012 (£1,035 14s. 0d.). The number of persons known to have been sent for by them is 104.

Mr. Foster, believing that a judicious system of emigration is the most speedy and effectual means of relieving poverty and of raising wages, hopes to be able to send a much larger number of emigrants from Ireland next season, and will take the greatest care in their selection, not only out of each family, with special reference to the smallness of their earnings, their good characters and industrious habits; the preference being given to members of the largest families, with the expectation that they will themselves bring out the remaining members of their families; and he will, also, in every case himself select suitable ships, and accompany the emigrants from the neighborhood of their own homes to the ship. Those who may have friends in America within 500 miles of New-York or Quebec will be sent direct to them, if they wish it; the rest will be sent to where labor is known to be in demand, and will be provided with proper recommendations.

Communications (from the Clergy especially), and liberal subscriptions from all who approve of the object, are respectfully invited, addressed to "Vere Foster, care of Messrs. Swift, Ransom & Co., 31 Pine street, New-York."

JOHN MARTIN.

We have received from our friend John Martin a letter in reply to Mitchel's. By a mistake it appears in another part of our paper. The character of the writer, however, the excellent sentiments he expresses—the very name of the man in fact—give it a prominence which could not be improved by the help of an editorial column.

THE DEVIN REILLY TESTIMONIAL.

The feasibility of this project has been still more deeply impressed on us since our last publication. Several journals have reproduced the ideas of our article, and kindly given notice of the meeting to be held at the office of the IRISH NEWS, on the 3d of September.

We have been cheered with the frequent inquiries made on the subject, and the fervent hopes expressed by good, intelligent and respectable men for the complete success of our desires. Several Members of Congress and prominent citizens heartily sympathise with our intentions, and only await the action of the meeting to exert their influence in behalf of this long-delayed tribute to the genius and struggles of the young and bold champion of the Democracy. We have also received some letters, with subscriptions in two instances of Ten Dollars each, from patriotic gentlemen, whose prompt liberality will be duly acknowledged.

PARISIAN SCANDAL—COURTS AND COUNTRIES.

European intelligence is sadly falling off in interest. The last mail was wretchedly deficient in political excitement, and would have been utterly unreadable, but for a hot coal of slander which is setting the London papers in a blaze.

These journals have got so used to "pitching in" to something or somebody during the war, that their editors and news-collectors must not be judged too harshly if their desire for some striking feature of intelligence has not suddenly abated. Having written down and otherwise bombarded the stronghold of the enemy, it will be a pleasant change to direct their quills and steel pens against an Ally. They can do this the more piquantly because they know his weakness as well as his strong points, and secretly prefer, with a pardonable jealousy, to dwell more upon the former than the latter. Having been made game of at Sebastapol, they in turn "fall foul" of the Tuileries, and while appearing as the gallant champion of the honor of Eugenie, they make her position equally odious as that of her husband, who does not contradict, as the London papers call on him to do, the "extraordinary statements" and "unhappy rumors" which are calculated to ruin the reputation of his wife. Here is a specimen paragraph from the Star:

There are some very unhappy rumors floating all over Paris about the state of things established at the Tuileries, which it is very much to be hoped are entirely without foundation Moreover, the statements gather strength, and are repeated from day to day. No doubt the Legitimist and Republican parties in Paris will take care that the stories do not lose exciting interest in the repetition. We are sorry to add that the character of the Empress herself continues to be cruelly aspersed. Now that the Emperor returns to Paris, it ought to be his first duty to bring the authors of these calumnies to justice.

This, with a little diplomatic bowing and cross-firing, embraces the European news up to the 13th instant.

In England there is nothing stirring save the scandal above quoted. Spain is quiescent. O'Donnell dictates, while every body anxiously gapes and wonders what he is going to do. Is he going to join the progress people—will they tie themselves like a kettle to the rampant dog's tail—will they allow themselves to be rattled over the pavement amid the jeers and laughter of Europe—will he, or can he do without them? These are questions which reflect the present appearance of Spanish affairs. Madrid was at last accounts struggling with a less tranquil bandit than soldiery, and a greater leveller than revolution—the Cholera. There are distressing accounts of its fury. Espartero had taken amicable leave of the Queen. General Serrano is appointed Spanish Minister to Paris. O'Donnell had not published the programme of his ministry.

The chief Russian items indicate the coronation of the Emperor, and a "misunderstanding" about the proprietorship of the Isle of Serpents. Russia still maintains that the Isle of Serpents belongs to her, and it is rumored that Napoleon has sent a supplementary note to be inserted in the treaty to settle the point.

A RETIRING SENTINEL.

Mr. Beverly Tucker has written a letter to the National Intelligencer, announcing the discontinuance of his able Democratic journal, the Washington Sentinel. Mr. Tucker carried into the editorial office the fearlessness, independence and geniality which, so happily, characterize him in the less public duties of the world, and leaves it, no doubt, with the personal relations of life as little invaded by acrimony or ill-feeling, as his political faith has been warped or swayed from its original strength. His letter is short, sharp, and truly worthy of the writer, being conceived in a firm Democratic spirit, and executed with much simple force and aptness. In explanation of his retirement, of his experience, and as conveying, moreover, the political deductions of Mr. Tucker, we quote a couple of short paragraphs, or rather, we should say, half of the "valedictory:"

Subsequent events plainly indicate that the fancied power and strength of that dangerous (Fremont) party are fast waning, and that the triumph of the Democratic ticket in the present contest is not now even problematical. The gratifying indications that the South will be a unit in November next, and the very positive assurances of our friends that the larger portion of the North and North-west will be ranged on the side of the Democracy, render the continuance of "The Sentinel" no longer essential to the campaign.

I may be permitted to say, in conclusion, that I carry into my retirement convictions greatly strengthened by the experience an editorial life has conferred, that the principles of the State Rights Democratic party are the only principles upon which the perpetuity of our Union can rest with honor and safety. For the maintenance of these principles "The Sentinel" was established; a departure from them has never been charged by its worst enemies.

Thus, with sincere gratitude for the favors of the past, and a hearty congratulation for "the bright victory that awaits all who love their country," Mr. Tucker gets off public duty. As a Sentinel, he never slept on his post, but on the contrary was so unceasing a watcher that he almost may be proclaimed as a veteran.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

CROSSING THE LINE IN HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SLOOP-OF-WAR, THE SWIFT, SATURDAY, JULY 11TH, 1849.

The event was celebrated much in the usual way. The mainsail, suspended between the main and foremasts, swung like a huge hammock, within half a foot of the deck. It was destined to serve as the baptismal font in the approaching solemnities. Right over one end of it—the end nearest the quarter-deck—a wooden platform, consisting of a couple of rough planks and a hand-rail, was set up. It was connected with the deck by a ricketty ladder, furnished with a precarious balustrade of rope. The ascent to the platform overlooking the ceremonial cistern, was perilous in the extreme. Other indications of the functions on the eve of being administered, were discernible in the varieties of slight and valueless articles of dress which the entire ship's company, officers and men, had providently assumed.

One gentleman, for instance, flourished about in a canvas trowsers, and a nankeen waistcoat without buttons. Another was tightly sheathed in a cotton knee-breeches. That was all. A third was loosely packed in a stiff, crusty, purplish, mildewed Mackintosh. It looked, for all the world, like the skin of a huge French prune. So, too, with a fourth, a fifth, a sixth. So, too, with twenty, thirty, forty more; each one being more or less ingeniously prepared for the drenching, the premonitory spatterings of which were already felt.

A few minutes of ten, the rolling of a side-drum, the scraping of a fiddle, the sprightly squeaking of a fife—accompanied by a chaotic chorus of oceanic sounds—sounds of whales, conger-eels, porpoises, monsters of every conceivable shape and the wildest rapacity—were heard behind the great screen of canvas, which, stretching across from bulwark to bulwark abreast of the foremast, shut off the forecastle from the other three-fourths of the deck. At the same moment, this screen was slowly drawn back, disclosing the head and front of a solemn procession.

A fiddler came first. A fifer and drummer followed him demurely. Sharing the fate of genius and the generality of artists, they appeared in a state of extreme destitution. They were more than half naked. Half a dozen of exceedingly loose kind of characters—gay rollicking gentlemen evidently without any fixed profession or calling in life—fell in behind the musicians. It struck me they had no authority for being there. It would have puzzled them sorely, I thought, to have adduced such authority from the programme or ritual of the day. Seeing them at a distance, and having no means of ascertaining anything to the contrary, I concluded the vagabonds were there, in that conspicuous position, in conformity with the most hilarious spirit, and on the widest and most flexible principles, of public disturbance.

Straining under the weight of Neptune's car, which they drew with a ponderous sluggishness along, came the Constables of the Sea-God; each one stitched and tied up in a canvas bag, inlaid deeply with grease, oakum, and tar, having on his head a tarpaulin tiara or turban, embellished with grotesque hieroglyphics in yellow and red paint. These monsters, moreover, were equipped with huge staves, in shape, size, and moulding closely resembling the banisters of an old-fashioned staircase. They wore heavy white beards, two feet and some odd inches in length, full of knots, little crusts of tar, bits of junk and spun-yarn, crumbs of sea-biscuit, and many other desultory items indicative of a hard life, raw habits, and a want of cleanliness and self-respect.

Upon the heels of these savages—moaning and creaking as it jumbled along—came the great feature of the day, Neptune's Car, with himself, his wife and his eldest son, seated on top of it. They seemed to have a tight hold of their seats. But if safety was achieved by the grip, dignity was lost. The vibration, perceptible in the timbers of the car, naturally excited in the passengers, exalted as they were, sensations of an irritable nature. The carriage of one of the brass nine-pounders, served as the chariot of the God. It was decorated with a couple of English ensigns, which, mounted on bare-poles, showed off—a pair of lank footmen in court livery—behind.

Immediately in the rear of the chariot walked three hideous creatures—one having the head of a monstrous white Arctic bear, the legs and arms of a Hottentot scamp, the back-bone, chest, and stomach, it seemed to me, of a stale ante-diluvian lobster. This thing carried an immense earthenware bowl of white liquid, concerning the nature of which there prevailed among the ignorant many contradictory opinions. One time it was flummery. A minute after, it was white-wash. By-and-bye, it was a coagulated mixture of soap-suds. Later still, an innocent philosopher pronounced it nothing more than a simple preparation of flour (third quality) and rain-water. To this hour that bowl remains to me the profoundest mystery.

On the left of the lobster appeared a quieter creature. Endowed with a human face, goat's beard, nankeen dust-coat, and butler's apron, he brandished a fearfully long razor, furnished with a grim set of teeth. In his left hand he balanced a strop for sharpening the razor. The strop was three feet in length.

On the right of lobster, there walked a genteel-looking person dressed in a white shooting-jacket, very tight white trowsers, and a silk hat of a remote date. He was further provided with neat moustaches, white cotton gloves, and a black silk necktie on the verge of decay. Suspended from his right arm by a coarse yellow strap, he carried a black box, somewhere about a foot square. The lid of the box was kept open by the protruding necks of sundry bottles, containing, after the manner of the bowl, mixtures of a mystic character.

At the feet of the God and Goddess, their son lay coiled up, in a glazed hat and midshipman's coat. Behind and about the equipage, a crowd of the most disreputable characters—all, somehow or other, connected with his Majesty's court—pressed on. Kicking, jostling, roaring, foaming, plunging—to all appearances bent upon a scheme of wholesale destruction—they seemed thoroughly possessed with the spirit of cannibalism.

On came the procession. Slowly, solemnly, with a subdued ferocity.

For the first five minutes, not the slightest accident occurred. Scarcely had the musicians, however, set foot on the quarter-deck, when from every point, crevice, and projection—from main-top, hatch-way, bulwark, yard-arm—from bow and stern—from prow and boom—from poop and cat-head—there poured in, as if from ten thousand sluice-gates opened suddenly above, below, around us in all conceivable directions, floods upon floods of blinding water. Floods upon floods, slapping right down, right bang against, right through and through, the solemn procession of the God—drenching his fleecy beard and locks—spattering and splitting upon his hard and polished nose—beating about her head and ears the Leghorn his wife for the first time wore that day—dashing fiercely and ruthlessly against the legs, eyes, teeth and ears of every lesser divinity and monster—in one swift, precipitous, exhaustless inundation, sweeping the entire deck from stem to stern, spite of cordage, wine-casks, loose spars and sail-cloth. Flight and shelter were the overwhelming considerations of the moment.

Some made up the rigging of the mainmast. The captain's steward sprang upon the hammock-nettings on the larboard quarter, and with a desperate effort of expiring strength plunged head-foremost down amongst the rudder, oars, mops and crutches of the captain's gig. MacManus masked himself behind the captain's foot-bath in the small boat at the stern davits. Smith O'Brien fled helter-skelter to the poop, and there, with the hose playing plenteously and powerfully upon him, resigned himself to annihilation amongst the boarding-pikes and lanterns. The Purser, finding all facilities for defence or flight cut off, surrendered himself at once, and broadly turned his back to the pliant engine of destruction. The Surgeon tried several strategems—bounced and bobbed behind the compass-box—whirled about the wheel—shot from larboard to starboard and back again—a zig-zag of lightning. He did more. He flung himself before the Purser—flung himself before the Master—made for the whale-boat—made for the captain's gig. But in every nook and corner, at every twist and turn, he was met by the blinding, stunning flood—was washed from every mooring—driven clean out from every port. Dismantled, finally, drenched and bulged, bereft of rudder, chart and figure-head, he was whirled away—a dripping bundle of flesh and bone—right down the companion-hatch. Swept impetuously off through the narrow passage (where he came in violent contact with the sentry in the dark) he was stretched at length and stranded in the gun-room.

After a slight delay occasioned by this deluge, Neptune's car arrived at the foot of the fatal platform overlooking the baptismal pool. The Constables unyoked themselves. Hurrying to the lower deck for the first of the destined victims, they left the venerable God seated by his wife, complacently regarding the preparations for the ceremonies in his honor, and with equal complacency supporting his mighty Trident, with a Yarmouth bloater transpierced across the prongs.

In less than two minutes, the first victim was brought on deck. Blindfolded with half a yard of soaked canvas, half naked and all trembling, the hose, with its keen brass nose pointed within two inches of his head, played upon and all over him with the deadliest precision. Every two feet of his excruciating road to the scaffold, he received a profuse benediction from a bucket of water, hot and fresh from the sea. Under these circumstances, his spirits derived great buoyancy and strength from the exhilarating effusions of the flute, which with many a shrill jerk and intricate variation, preceeded him to the place of torture. Here the Barber, his assistant, and the Doctor awaited him with intense impatience and avidity.

Sometimes it so happened that the victim, finding the damp bandage across his face interfering with the freedom of his eyelids and nostrils, or conceiving that a crisis involving the question of life and death had arrived, suddenly broke loose from the Constables. With delirious writhings freeing himself from his bondage, he stared wildly round, and might possibly be in the very act of protesting against things going to extremities, when a shot from the hose, or a shower from the bucket, would abruptly terminate his struggles, delivering him up, motionless, speechless, insensible, into the grasp of the Constables once more.

At the foot of the ladder leading up to the scaffold, some one obstruction or another invariably took place. The sufferer got entangled in a coil of ropes, or put his leg over the balustrade, or having planted one foot on the lowest rung of the ladder, found it impossible to establish the other on the second. These mistakes, however, never moved the pity of the Constables, the Barber aloft, or the fierce rabble amidships. On the contrary, they provoked additional rigors. A Constable, for instance, poked the victim impatiently with his mace in the ribs—the hose rained upon him with redoubled vehemence and fury—the bandage was tightened up by one or two bewildering twists from behind (after the fashion of the garote) flattening the nose and screwing up the eyes. Another Constable, clutching the bandage with a death-grip, and ascending the ladder a little in advance of the sufferer, hoisted the miserable being by main force to the scaffold amid the pleasantest uproar.

Arrived at his destination, the patient was forced into a sitting position on a rail which served to prevent the performers on the scaffold tumbling into the cistern, directly over which they were stationed. On this bar he was so delicately poised, that the slightest touch would send him tumbling over it—down through a rapid succession of whirligigs and somersets, along an easy though somewhat precipitous slope of canvas—right slap into the pool below. Wading about at the bottom of this pool, with mouths wide open and outstretched paws, were half-a-dozen other monsters. The moment he descended, they caught the victim, ducking him ferociously within an inch of his life.

Seated on the rail, he was asked his name, his address, and other questions of equal importance. Endeavoring to answer them, he was favored with a daub of the white stuff, or was treated to a pill, or a spoon-full of medicine, by the Doctor in waiting. In the next place, perhaps, the extraction of a tooth was judged necessary. A boat-hook inserted within the jaws of the martyr, one or two abortive attempts were made to comply with the humane wishes of the medical adviser.

The operations of the scaffold concluded with a rapid shaving (it was very superficial) and a vigorous infusion of medicine. The projection from the rail took place then. The candidate for baptism disappeared with the speed of a flying fish, accomplishing in a quarter of a second a dozen or more revolutions in his descent. With a terrific souse and splash, hitting the bottom of the cistern, he was pounced upon by the Bears, who made the most of him until a fresh supply was announced.

Seven and twenty underwent this revered and ancient ceremony. Some with cheerless resignation. A few with rigid heroism. Others in a state of absolute despair. One or two with a defiant spirit. Two or three as if it were the greatest fun imaginable. All, I should say, with a friendly disposition towards their persecutors, and the most laudable sentiments of toleration and forgiveness.

The last victim disposed of, the procession reformed. The musicians struck up the British Grenadiers. The Constables wheeled away the God. The Barber, his assistant, and the mild Doctor fell in behind. With deep solemnity they went back the road they came. Midway, however, just as they reached the main-bits, the hose and buckets opened on them simultaneously, and with such effect and fury, that it seemed as if it would be an utter impossibility to get the ship to rights again, within a year and upwards.

In this trying moment most of the Constables stood by their sovereign. The Barber thrust his huge nose into the drooping folds of the Union Jack at the back of the triumphal car. The Doctor, heaving his drug-box and bottles overboard, renounced his allegiance to the Monarch of the Waves, and by an unseemly retreat added cowardice to his ungracious disloyalty. The Fiddler, under the base pretence of preserving his fiddle, flew to the main-top, leaving the Flute to manage by himself as well as he could.

A few minutes after, the heartiest huzzas announced the return of the glorious old man, with his wife and child, in good health and spirits, with their numerous suite in humor for their grog, at the family mansion in the Forecastle.

Fortunate senex! hic inter flumina nota,
Et fontes sacros, frigus captabis opacum.

SHADOW WORSHIP.

There is a treasure of old thoughts we prize:
  There are some visions which, though they be born
In youth's bright promise, 'mid its changing dyes,
  Outlive the radiance of that splendid morn—
Pierced they may be by many a chilling ray
Of Manhood's light, yet live they through the day.

Changefully sad they be, yet sometimes bright,
  When spirit fitful but their essence strong,
Even as a sound that startles in the night,
  And sudden breaks into a morning song;
Or like the playing of a wind-toss'd flame,
Which, flickering much, keeps burning still the same.

There is one light alone that thus can cheer
  The misty memory with unfailing beam;
Oh! wond'rous light, most lovely and most dear,
  Strong as the noon-tide, radiant as a dream!—
It is the light derived from Love's own sky,
Sweet parent of all tints that do not die.

Pride, hate, ambition, envy, pass away,
  Our very nature shuts them out at last;
'Tis Love alone that keeps his early sway,
  And proves us human while he holds us fast.
The abiding love of something, good or ill,
Even at the door of Death, doth bind us still.

'Tis the cold heart alone that hath no past
  Outside it's few first dream-distempered years;
'Tis the cold heart alone that cannot cast
  A nearer glance and find but hates and fears;
That hath no Shadow-Worship of it's own
To fill the place of Youth's bright idols overthrown.

But we, whose warm affections ever rise
  And seek divinities through earth and air,
If we confine them to the ears and eyes,
  That were a slavery too hard to bear—
To soar to what should be, is hope and faith—
To stoop to what we see—this is to lie with death.

Shall we not hunger if our food have taint?
  Shall we not thirst if water turn to blood?
Oh! yes, even if, debased by long restraint,
  Our vile accomodating senses should Grow beastly, still we'd hunger and we'd thirst
For excellence conceived, or beauty known at first.

Suppose we have a friend who's fallen away,
  We still can love him as he once was known;
Suppose we see some virtue in decay,
  We may replace that virtue on the throne.
A thousand truths may sleep in woeful thrall—
There is a resurrection in the soul for all.

And thus as many forms of beauty high
  Do throng upon our fancy, turning space
Into a region where the soul can fly

For rest, for inspiration, and for grace—
Say if the land of dreams like this can please,
Or what the forms of youth compared with forms like these.

"Oh! sad abstractedness," exclaim the gay,
The thoughtless, the inconstant and the vain;
"Better like us to worship things of clay,
"Than the thin vapid phantoms of the brain."
Aye better love the covering and the show
Than the great soul that lives, or ought to live, below.

'Tis good to have around us, as on wings,
Those forms to which realities should rise,
Those bright capacities for earthly things,
That point with speaking gesture to the skies—
Each bright with hope and saddened with reproof
From which it's own perversion hides and keeps aloof.

O thou dear Shade, whom first and best I prize
Of all the forms that haunt me, die not thou,
For still I'd see the smile within thine eyes,
And trace the flickering hopes upon thy brow:
Oh! no, thou wilt not die—Death cannot see
One shadowy friend of mine before he conquers me.

F. O'R.

IRISH PEASANT'S ADDRESS TO A RED-BREAST.

BY M. O'KEEFFE.

Hail, social songster of the crimson breast,
That heedless of chill winter's piercing rain,
Beside my shed dost pour the mellow strain
Betimes each dawn, while yet my limbs I rest:
Oh let me never be, with doubts distressed,
But found like thee, contented and resigned,
And in each gloom possessing cheer of mind,
Like that bestowed on thee, familiar guest:
O! in adversity's dark, dreary hour,
When I disowned shall be, by every friend,
And Age's troubles o'er my head impend,
And sullen Winter's dismal tempests lour,
Then, may my visits be as free from foes
As thine, sweet bird! till the ensuing summer glows.

THE SUMMER GARDEN; OR, PARADISE AND THE PERI.

What is so pleasant as a garden? It is our first idea of Paradise! To be sure, even that idea is mixed up with the vague haunting vision of the Serpent, but those critical creatures are possibly over abused. Full of this golden dream, we read a verse of the Doctors, which we will repeat for the benefit of the human race:

Oh, it were sweet, by heaven, to live and die,
Within the glory of a garden land;
To see above us the o'er-arching sky,
And each sweet tree stretch out its loving hand,
To clasp us fondly as we wandered by
As tho' we were one of their leafy band;
And then amid the grovy glooms to meet
With some fair angel, more than Candy sweet.

Full of this dear delicious dream, which recalled the olden time to us, we meandered, like a river, our way up Broadway, when, at the corner of Broome street, we saw inscribed in golden letters, "Stuart's Summer Garden." Great was our delectation—a garden! Eden loomed upon our soul like a glass of Lager Bier, and from its foam we beheld our Eve arise, as Venus from the sea, the vision of all ideal loveliness. We were about entering, when we saw a Bank of Moss, with a golden cup, into which the crowding devotees placed reverently small pieces of silver, as a tribute to the Goddess of the Garden. We did the same, and passed on to the inner bower. Never shall we forget the paradisiacal scene that burst upon us—groves of trees, worthy of the Druids; flowers, whose perfume filled the air; little rivulets, gushing between their pebbly banks; grassy lawns, on which Shepherds and Shepherdesses reclined, while the leafy branches were loaded with birds of the most gorgeous plumage, which poured out the most ravishing music, all thrilled and echoed with melody.

In the centre of this Arcadia was a beautiful building, so light and graceful, that it rose, more like an exhalation from the earth than a piece of architecture. In the centre, was a picture representing a winding river and sylvan scenes. Before this mysterious curtain were some musicians, led by a famous shepherd called Stoepel, who, at the ringing of a bell, commenced playing the most beautiful airs; and slowly the pictorial mystery arose and discovered a young shepherd, whose father was rich in herds and flocks, but who had married a girl, who, instead of looking after the lambs and kids, idled her time in singing, dancing, and playing on the pipe—in point of fact, as Micawber would say, an actress! The swain laments to his wife the obstinacy of his parent, and informs her that such is his prejudice against her on account of her singular taste, that he has disinherited him and adopted his cousin, who is a sailor, that is to say, one who wanders upon the sea, like the Argonauts of old. Never shall we forget the beautiful shepherdess, whose love of music, dancing, and singing had so captivated her lover, and so irritated the father. Her smile was a spiritual light—the very sunshine of love. "Happy shepherd!" we mentally exclaimed, "who would not be stripped of flocks, herds and farms for such a divinity?" All of a sudden she tells her husband to cheer up—she will make all right—she will disgust the old shepherd with the interloping nephew—make him reconciled to her profession, and finally forgive his son. The disinherited shepherd shakes his head, but hopes for the best. The fair Chameleon, as the dear enchantress is called, then disappears. Scarcely had she left ere the old shepherd comes in and shakes his crook at the head of his son, when he commands him to leave his cottage. Excellently well did Burnett brandish his crook, and, after a little pleasant Arcadian swearing, the youthful shepherd abandons his ancestral hearth, to roam the dreary fields of other lands, and tend the future mutton of others, instead of fattening and eating his own.

When the old shepherd is left alone, he laments the depravity of his son, who prefers a wife famous for her pipe rather than her crook, and who loves dancing and singing better than spinning and nursing lambs; he reiterates his determination to give all to his nephew, and leave his son a beggar. The words are scarcely out of his mouth, when Agnes Robertson (the every-day name of the shepherdess, who loves singing, music and dancing better than nursing the lambs) enters, disguised as the usurping nephew; she behaves so very rudely to the old foolish shepherd, that he begins to repent his turning his own son away. Agnes then departs, after poking the old chap in the ribs, and presently comes in again, disguised as a young shepherdess, whom she pretends the graceless shepherd has deceived and ruined. At this new outrage the old chap gets excited, and swears he'll have nothing to say to his nephew, unless he marries the betrayed lamb—we mean shepherdess. The weeping girl is told to call again, and so she goes. Then comes Agnes Robertson again, dressed as a real actress—silk stockings—short petticoats—roses in hair—and wearing the loveliest little ankles and sandals in the world. Never did we behold a more bewitching creature. It was the beauty of Venus, with the virtue of Diana, and the grace of Hebe. We threw ourselves upon our verdant couch, gave a deep sigh, and shut our eyes, that we might keep the charming vision all to ourselves. A burst of applause from the surrounding swains made us open them again, and we saw the Fairy Star all tears, and relating how his son had made love to her, won her affections, and then deserted her, a spotless maiden. She told the old shepherd that she was an actress; but so fascinating was the dear little creature, that she conquered the father's heart, and he swore by Pan, the god of Arcadia, that he would marry her himself if his rascally son would not, and was down on his marrow-bones making love to her, when who should rush into the cottage but—the son! The aged shepherd, Burnett, looked mighty foolish, got up, and then insisted upon his cruel, wicked son marrying her on the spot. Agnes Robertson then confessed the plot, and the old, cruel Burnett turned, all of a sudden, an affectionate father, blessed them, and joined their hands, to a strain of Stoepel's rustic pipe, and the curtain fell to loud applause.

We sat for a few minutes looking on the surrounding trees, laden with fruit, and under whose boughs sat at least a thousand swains, with their loves. At this minute, a little Ganymede approached with a silver vase, and presented us with a draught of the pure Castalian spring, which we drank with great pleasure. Feeling hungry, we stretched forth our hand and plucked some most luscious peaches, which grew wild and gratis—just as ice-creams and roasted quails do at Taylor's and Thompson's. We were taking our last bite of a pomegranate, when the Archon of this happy land, Mr. Stuart, came up, with his bright, intellectual eye, and finely-formed head. He welcomed us to his Garden, and said he hoped the time would come when all the world would be a Paradise, and full of such divine Peris as the goddess of the scene before us, the bright Fairy Star of Dion's Arcadia. We rose, and adjourning to the Tuetonic Temple of Bacchus, near it, we offered a libation to his shrine in copious potations of a nectar called lager bier, and embracing the heroic Stuart, we departed, musing how little the perambulators of New-York know what a glorious Eden is at the corner of Broome street and Broadway. We dreamed all that night we were carousing with the Shepherds, Dion and Stuart, beneath orange groves, squeezing the ripe grapes, and the hands of still riper Shepherdesses, who danced and sang to the pipe of Stoepel.

JAMES SHERIDAN KNOWLES.

Wonderful are the ways of genius. A Parisian playwright realizes a fortune from the production of a flimsy vaudeville. An Irish dramatist, who has restored to the stage the tragic dignity of the Elizabethan era, throws down the pen and takes up the poor-box. He no longer holds the mirror, but the tin-plate, up to nature; and meekly welcomes therein the little silver and copper miniatures—as good as gold—which his listeners, through admiration for the "piety" of the fallen dramatist, more than pity for his fate, vouchsafe to his old age.

They are flattered to believe that he gives up to their party the genius destined for mankind. Their religion is radiant in the belief that the author of William Tell and Virginius has fallen from his high estate, from the humane elements above them into the bigoted sectionalism of the parochial pulpit. So they pay, and mayhap the poet will gather from various sources wherewith to tinge his declining gray hairs with the partial sunny ray of comfort. He has a small pension from the Queen on the score of literary merit; he also is entitled to an honorarium every time that any of his plays are enacted within the United Kingdom; still a little more for the "stomach's sake," is a necessity to meet which pew doors cannot remain closed, nor inconsistency be censured as a deadly sin. All the world's a stage, and if Sheridan Knowles is at present acting in an afterpiece beneath his character, still be the role ever so ridiculous, it cannot obliterate the remembrance of his previous greatness in the noblest paths of the Drama. A correspondent of the Toronto Globe gives the following picture of Knowles as he is:

"Some years ago the author of Virginius and the Hunchback became a member of the Baptist communion, and now officiates as a regular and duly recognised preacher therein. His discourses, I am certiorated, though rather lean, so far as matter is concerned, are exceedingly animated and energetic, which might have been anticipated from the peculiar genius and lively temperament of the man.

"Amongst other topics, Knowles prominently tackles the stage, which, to use a flash expression, he 'handles without gloves.' Nothing can be more uncompromising than his denunciation of histrionics in every shape and form, and without mincing matters, or going about the bush, he characterises the theatre as the veritable domus diaboli.

"Not unnaturally has this crusade against the sock and buskin provoked the antagonism of the followers of Thespis. Instead, however, of tackling the arguments of their opponent, they content themselves with twitting him on the inconsistency which he manifests in continuing to draw the aforesaid pension and perquisites, which must not fail to be regarded by him now as 'the wages of sin.'

"Very trying to flesh and blood is the predicament in which the poor poet is placed, and up to the present moment he has given no indication of the mode in which he intends to cut the Gordian knot. With the proverbial improvidenc of the 'irritable race' he hath (not?) saved his nest-egg for the sustentation of old age, and an unendowed body holds out but scanty prospects of support to a minister who has witnessed the setting sun of his seventy-sixth birth-day!

"The Anglican Baptists would do themselves credit by raising a fund to enable this generous, single-hearted and impulsive creature to follow the dictates of conscience, without incurring the pains and penalties of penury and want. A subscription, having such an object in view, would be largely contributed to by many who did not belong to the above-mentioned religious society. Like the Jews and Scots, Knowles' old pupils are to be met with in almost every quarter of the globe, and I cannot conceive of one of the number grudging a mite to dear old 'Paddy,' as we used fondly to call him."

THE MAGAZINES.

HARPER for September opens with a truly interesting paper on the applicability of photography to printing, illustrated with no less than twenty-four engravings. In the progressive state of the illustrative arts, of which the photograph is becoming so prominent a member, the present paper will be read with great interest. "The Dismal Swamp," the scene of one of Tom Moore's inspirations—with a beautiful effect, too—is illustrated by Porte Crayon to the extent of fifteen pencillings, which are attractive, and induce the casual looker-over the pages to a perusal of their clever contents. The Life and Adventures of Beckwourth, which we reviewed at length a couple of weeks back, is condensed to the capacity of Harper's readers, and accompanied by many of the original illustrations. We have another batch of "Daniel Webster's Social Hours." The prime "Passages of Eastern Travel" are continued, and illustrated; also, "Little Dorrit." "Fossil Remains of Scottish Society" is a too brief notice of the early days of the Edinburgh Review. Here is a specimen brick:

"Fifty years ago there was a Review at Edinburgh—not a review of troops, but a quarterly periodical, full of sense and wit and logic and eloquence and learning. That Review was, at the time, one of the best known things in Scotland; and now that half a century has elapsed, the Edinburgh—one might almost say the Scotland—of the beginning of this century is best remembered by the Review. Nor is this unjust. It has exercised so wide an influence over public opinion every where—has done so much for liberal philosophy and sound doctrine in every branch of human learning—has achieved so wonderful a success, not only as regards principles, but also for the men who advocated them, that it is not unnatural it should absorb the attention of all who think of the Scottish capital half a century since. Thanks to recent works, such as Sydney Smith's Correspondence and the Life of Jeffrey, the Edinburgh Review is as familiar to us as any of our own periodicals. We see fat little Jeffrey in his editorial chair pruning articles that are to change British policy; jovial Sydney Smith, the wisest wit and the wittiest sage that ever lived; immense Brougham, stalking like a giant through the field of human knowledge, and plucking the tallest flowers without exertion; learned Mackintosh, virtuous Horner, exact Playfair; Allen, Leyden, Brown, Moncrieff, Cockburn, and a host of others, men of strong sense, undaunted minds, unyielding principle: all young, all poor, all frowned upon by the ruling powers, barely regarded as fit for the relations of society by respectable people, anathematized as little better than atheists by the Church; yet so wielding this quarterly weapon of theirs as not only to direct the legislation of Great Britain, but to advance the cause of humanity, justice, and popular rights in Europe, more in the course of a quarter of a century than it had advanced in any two centuries before, to spread the fame of Edinburgh throughout the civilized world, and to conquer for themselves the highest rewards that ambition could desire, or a grateful nation award. And this picture is so striking, so singular, so grand, that we seldom inquire whether there was any other worth seeing in the same place at the same time."

"Soldiering in Oregon," and other contributions, not omitting the comic pictures at the end, entitled "Advertisements—Illustrated," make up a capital number.

MRS. STEPHENS' NEW MONTHLY.—If a continued display of elegance in the making-up of this "New Monthly" is any key to its success—which we think it is—then the Magazine is in a flourishing condition, and promises stability, amusement and instruction. Mrs. Stephens' labors in this new field we think will prove exceedingly acceptable, not only for the more delicate portion of readers, but will become a quickly-missed and eagerly sought friend of others who read for the sake of reading. The September issue has Chapters V. and VI. of the novel by the editor, entitled "Lost Jewels." The second article is devoted to a notice of Jerome Thompson, with two illustrations from pictures lately exhibited by that artist. Mr. Thompson's designs engrave well, and convey pleasant stories. "The Negro at the Pump" is especially natural. Other artists might have commanded precedence in Mrs. Stephens' gallery, but we are thankful that he has been reproduced, and happy that the "New Monthly," in its own words, "will always perpetuate and honor the genius which best illustrates the scenery of our own land, and the habits of our own people." "Love in '76" is concluded, which, with other novelties, such as "Agatha Grasset," a tale in four chapters, the "Headman's Tale," and the lesser stories, as the "Midnight Fright," and a French incident, "Too Shrewd by Half," make up the number. W. W. Fosdick contributes a genial love song. From "Things we Talk About" we clip the following:

"Poor Poe (we wonder if this epithet clings to Poe merely because of the alliteration) has fallen into French hands. His works have recently been published in Paris, where they have created no little sensation. Criticisms and eulogies abound. Among them is the following extraordinary 'notice' from the pen of M. D'Aurevilly:

"'There is indeed something Medusean in Edgar Poe—genius and destiny! His life and talent frighten us. Everything is, in in this great outlaw, sinister, black, terrible, of a profound and tragically voluntary disorder. Edgar Poe was an unfortunate of the most startling proportions. Aristocratic, like Lord Byron, he was born chained to the yoke of a democracy. America, which covers with dollars the meanest mountebank, was for him the tower of starvation, and made him swallow every evening the key which Gilbert swallowed but once—in the agonies of death. The same eternal history, but with a still more beautiful variation in its inexhaustible cruelty! Poe lived all his life, which was happily short, in disdain, in misery, and ceaseless labor, for he worked like a slave; but the sweat in which we are to eat our bread flowed fruitless over his stoical forehead. Unhappy vagabond he! He became a drunkard by misery of the heart, like Sheridan—poor Brinsley—who drank for hours, silently in tears! Formed from a harder marble, Edgar Poe drank his chalice of fire with a colder frenzy. But the alcohol did none the less asphyxiate his powerful youth. In full physical and mental beauty, he died of delirium tremens in the street—no, not in the street, but in the gutter—stretched out helpless, far from God and damned, he believed, for he believed that! The fixed idea of Poe, the idea which usurped his mind, which crushed him, but which in striking, found him impassible, was the idea of his damnation, without remission and without mercy. A thing as horrible as true, he accepted his position of reprobate and nursed it.'"

"The Tongue of Fire; or The True Power of Christianity;" by William Arthur, A. M., author of "The Successful Merchant," is the title of a series of essays of a religious, meditative, and philosophical character, tinged with the peculiar hues of the author's belief. There is evidence of erudition and patient inquiry, and the themes are illustrated with happy allusions to, and deductions from science, literature, &c. The style is clear, and inspires one with a pleasant and reliable feeling as regards the author's honesty in his own convictions. The following extract being suitable for the eye of whatsoever worshipper at a Christian shrine, is the more suitable as a specimen of Mr. Arthur's manner:

"The sanctuary of God ought, undoubtedly, to be the highest scene and model of propriety; the pulpit to be its foremost and most shining example. He, who, under any pretext, introduces trifling, oddity or coarseness there, strikes fearfully at a main support of power—true reverence. However offensive want of propriety may be elsewhere, it is doubly so in the house of God. But the united praying of Christians, the delivering of a message from above, and the mingling of thankful voices in praise to the Most High, like all other peculiar actions, have a propriety of their own; and of all improprieties, none is more thoroughly alien to them than that, be it what it may—whether stiff form or elaborate literature—which gives to the place a savor rather of the wisdom of man than of the power of God. At a marriage-feast, the solemnity proper to a funeral would be an impropriety. In a company of friends the precision of a military movement would be improper. The noise of instruments is propriety in a concert, the sound of grinding in a mill, the clatter of shuttles in a factory, the ring of hammers in a forge, the laughter of children in a nursery.

"And so the house of God has its own atmosphere; whatever would extinguish the reverent utterance of penitent or grateful emotion on the part of the simple and the poor, of the newly awakened or newly forgiven—whatever would train all Christian feelings to move there, in God's own house and in the assembly of His people, as if under the cold eye of a heathen world, is a more crying impropriety than those departures from taste which not only might flow, but must flow, from the utterance of feelings where any multitude, composed of all classes, is deeply affected."

The book is very neatly printed and has a good steel engraving of the author. (Harper & Brothers.)

"The Old Chest and its Treasures" is a neat and pleasant compilation of various anecdotes of remarkable people, historical allusions, meditative musings, happy reflections, instructive paragraphs, amusing stories, and suggestive items generally. "Aunt Elizabeth" thought that by making a common-place book of the best things that fall from or float though the press—at least such as from their nature might be deemed worthy of another day's reading—she would be doing something useful. Well, the good lady has made a pleasant enough little work, and one which can be put into the hands of all ages, sexes, and religions. (M. W. Dodd.)

The sixth part of Monsig'r Gentillucci's Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary is quite in keeping with the previous periodical issues of the work, and is equally worthy of the taste and devotion of the publisher. In the present there is an effective steel engraving from the design of Johannot. The work, when complete, will be an artistic offering, to say nothing of the more imperative virtues it possesses from its excellent nature.—J. B. Kirker.

SONG OF AFFECTION.

BY BELLE LISLE.

Be mine an Irish cottage home,
Upon some green hill side;
I little care how wild or lone,
If Norah's but my bride.

Outside I want no balustrade,
Within no sculptured gem:
The oak shall be my only shade,
And love my diadem.

The roof may be of slate or thatch,
The door an oaken door;
I'll greet the stranger to my latch,
Ah! woo him to the floor.

I'll tell him how in times of yore,
Ere Saxon came or guile,
Or Norman track was on our shore,
How happy was our Isle.

A kitchen and a sitting room,
A bed-room ten feet square;
An ivy covered vestibule;
Inside an arm chair.

The haughty lord may pass along,
And look with cold disdain;
I'm happier in my mountain home,
Than he in his domain.

Literary and Artistic News.

The following, from Household Words, gives in brief space the names and characteristics of eminent living characters who have raised themselves by their own exertions:

To begin with the letter A, and dash hastily and skippingly on throughout the alphabet—we find that Anderson, the popular Danish novelist, was the son of a cobbler, and educated at a charity school; and that he tried for years to gain a living by various handicraft trades, being frequently on the very brink of starvation. Beranger, the celebrated French lyric poet, neglected by his vagabond father, lived with his godfather, a poor tailor, and was a gamin in the streets of Paris, till promoted for a time to the dignity of pot-boy. Elihu Burritt, as all know, was a blacksmith's apprentice. Carleton, the Irish novelist, who now enjoys a pension of £200 a year, is the son of a peasant, and begged his way to knowledge. Carera, President of the Republic of Guatemala, began life as a drummer-boy and cattle-driver. Mr. Cobden is a son of a small farmer, and, entering a warehouse in London when a boy, rose through its various grades of service. Sir William Cubitt was a working miller, then a joiner, and then a mill-wright. Dumas, the French novelist and dramatist, is the illegitimate son of a planter and negress; and was in all but starvation in Paris, till he hit upon the way to distinction. Faraday, the eminent chemist, is the son of a poor blacksmith, and began his career as the apprentice to a bookbinder. The present Emperor of Hayti was born a slave. Harrington, the animal painter, began his profession with signboards and coach pannels. Jasmin, the Burns of the South of France, is the son of a tailor, and the grandson of a common beggar. Mr. Lindsay, M. P., the great ship-owner, left his home in Ayr, with 3s. 9d. in his pocket, to push his fortune as a ship boy; he worked his passage to Liverpool, by assisting in the coal-hole of a steamer; and for a part of the time after he arrived, begged during the day, and slept in the sheds and streets at night. Lough, the distinguished sculptor, began the world in the capacity of a plough-boy. Minnie, the inventor of the well-known rifle, was a private soldier. Robert Owen was a shop-boy to a grocer, and then a draper. Johannes Ronge, the leader of the German Catholic movement, tended sheep when a boy. Stanfield, the distinguished landscape painter, was a cabin-boy, and the shipmaster was his first patron. Thiers, the well-known historian, and ex-Minister of France, is the son of a poor blacksmith, and was educated gratuitously at the public school of Marseilles. Thomas Wright, the Manchester prison philanthropist, was a weekly worker in an iron foundry for forty-seven years, till a large sum of money was raised by subscription to enable him to carry out his philanthropical labors.

There is encouragement here, we fancy, for the poor and down-hearted; and likewise rebuke for those who are continually harping on the wrongs of the indigent, and the impassable barriers between the high and low.

The Baton Rouge Advocate thus describes Mr. Toohey, the "boy soldier," who was in Nicaragua, and who is at present lecturing in the south on his Central American adventures:

"Mr. Toohey is a quiet, unassuming and gentlemanly youth, only nineteen years of age. He has undergone hardships which might put many a veteran soldier to the blush. On the battle-field of Santa Rosa, where the cowardly Schlessinger fled, he was one of the brave little band who resisted the Costa Rican forces. When in the act of loading his musket, his arm, which was bent, was pierced by a Minie rifle-ball in two places, shattering the bone. Thus rendered powerless, he was taken prisoner, among the twenty-six unfortunates who were subsequently butchered by the Costa Ricans. When dragged out for execution, when every volley rang the death-knell of a brave comrade, when even hope itself had "bid farewell," the angel of deliverance appeared in the shape of woman.

Oh, woman! whose form and whose soul
Are the spell and the light of each path we pursue,
Whether sunn'd in the tropics, or chilled at the pole,
If Woman is there, there is happiness too.

A Costa Rican lady, in whose veins flows the pure warm blood of Castile, compassionating his youth, begged his life at the hands of his captors, with tears in her eyes. The boon was granted, and his life spared.

In a few months, the Appletons will publish, in one volume large 8vo, the whole Poetical Writings of Mrs. Estelle A. Lewis, of Brooklyn. Of these poems a considerable portion has already been published, viz., "Records of the Heart," "The Child of the Sea," and "Myths of the Minstrel." Two of these separate volumes have reached a second and the other a third edition. Mrs. Lewis writes poetry with feeling, enthusiasm, taste, and heart. The volume will be attractive in other respects, as it will contain a number of illustrations (besides a portrait by Elliott), finely engraved in the line manner, by Darley, Richards, Cheney, Huntington, Durand, H. K. Brown, Smiley, Chappell, and others. This beautiful volume, so rich in spoils won from the kindred realms of Poetry and Painting, will appear in November.

GREAT DEMOCRATIC JUBILEE.

Thursday evening, August 21, was a glorious demonstration of the strength of the Democracy of New York. More than fifty thousand persons were congregated in Tammany Hall and in the Park, and the most gratifying concord and enthusiasm prevailed.

The whole Eastern portion of the Park, says the Daily News, occupying the space south of the Hall and the Hall of Records, together with the open area in front of Tammany Hall and north of the Brick Church, was filled with the Democratic host. From the north-west corner of Tammany Hall, a brilliant Drummond light cast its illumination over the sea of faces, and brought out the devices and mottoes on the numberless banners which were scattered throughout the vast assemblage.

The scene was one of surpassing splendor, and will long be remembered by those who witnessed this first gathering of the Clubs in their jubilee to ratify the nominations of Buchanan and Breckinridge, Parker and Vanderbilt.

The masses of the people, the hard-working men of the North, the mechanic of the city, the farmer of the great interior, the sailor, the exile from Ireland and from Germany, are uniting around the platform and the Standard of Democracy—and they will be victorious. New York, with her united, consolidated, concordant Democracy, has fired the first great broadside in the cause. It will echo over the land, and gladden the heart of every patriot within our land, and every lover of freedom through the world.

John S. Chambers, Esq., called the meeting to order, and nominated the Hon. Edward C. West as Chairman of the meeting.

Resolutions backing up the Cincinnati nominations were passed and applauded to the echo. Mr. C. Schwackhamer moved their adoption.

Three cheers for our next Governor and Lieutenant Governor were then given, after which the Hon. Amasa J. Parker was introduced, amid vociferous and long continued cheering.

He besought the Democracy to look closely at the course they should pursue in the approaching election. Let us never, said he, forget that the Democratic party is unchangeable in name and in character. [Applause.] It has never been led out of the path of duty by any of the allurements of the day; it never seeks to obtain power by courting the temporary and local excitements that may happen to exist (cheers); but under the broad foundation of the constitution upon which it is erected, it moves steadily forward, and thus it will move to the end. It behooves us in this election to look carefully to the dangers with which we are surrounded. If you are sending upon a stormy sea a ship freighted with your wealth—a ship that was to encounter storms and tempests, and navigate a narrow and dangerous channel, would you not look, in the selection of a pilot, to see that you had a man of experience?

Will you pay less attention, when you send off this Ship of State upon the stormy sea of political strife; will you be less careful to select an experienced pilot; one tried and of known integrity, one acquainted with the shoals, quicksands, and whirlpools which it has to encounter? Is it of no importance that this vast Ship of State, freighted with the memory of the past, the wealth of the present, and all the hope of the future, shall be put into the hands of one of long and tried experience? Such a man is James Buchanan. [Tremendous cheering.]

Mr. Parker resumed his seat, and was greeted with repeated demonstrations of applause.

Judge Vanderbilt was introduced to the immense multitude, amid protracted applause. Fellow Democrats: I am happy to meet you here to-night. Though I shall talk to you but a few words, I trust that they will come from the heart, and be heartily responded to by you. (Applause.) I am happy to find myself placed in the position which I find myself occupying. I have been preceeded by the Chief Magistrate, who has gone over the entire ground. I willingly stand by him as his lieutenant—(tremendous cheering)—and in the name of God and of the Democracy, I ask you to follow me. (Renewed applause.) The waves of sectionalism, for some time past, have been rolling over the land, and there has been an attempt upon the part of our opponents to create this feeling between two parts of the Union. With that view the Democratic party proceeded to Cincinnati to make their nominations. Great anxiety was felt at that Convention, and with wisdom and prudence have made nominations to allay this sectional feeling, instead of nominating a man who is designated by his particular friends as "Pathfinder," in the language of the Chairman of this meeting. (Three groans for Fremont.) A man whose particular merit seems to have been finding some path across the Rocky Mountains alone; who is claimed by his friends to be an explorer, all of which indicates that he has no settled purpose, or no settled knowledge of anything. (Applause.) The Democracy in solemn conclave nominated a statesman, whose history has proved that he was a statesman, whose long life has found out every path, whose long life has explored every region, and whose whole career has taught him to rove where the line of duty shall place him. He is not an "Explorer;" he is not a "Pathfinder;" but he knows every matter connected with our country, every matter connected with our history, and he knows our Constitution. (Great cheering.) Had we intended to nominate a Pathfinder or an Explorer, why in the name of Heaven did we not take Kit Carson? (Loud laughter.)

The chairman then announced Mr. Dogherty of Philadelphia, as the next speaker. Three cheers were proposed and heartily given to the eloquent Pennsylvanian. After silence was restored, Mr. Dogherty said: There are three candidates in the field. The first was nominated in a convention in which dissensions existed from its commencement to its close. Millard Fillmore was nominated on that occasion in my native State. They acted the part of traitors to their country and to the Constitution. But the other convention that assembled in the Queen City of the West was a sight well calculated to gladden the heart of a patriot, for he beheld before him the representatives of the Democracy of the Republic. (Applause.) They met as a band of brothers and parted as such. The men of Maine and Massachusetts cordially greeted the citizens of California and Carolina—men whose homes were by the shores of the Atlantic and the Pacific, where the sound of civilization is ushered in by the dashing of their waves. We behold in the person of our candidate a man who is the type of our country's institutions. Sprung from poverty's ranks, he has by his own arm placed his name upon the shining scroll of fame and immortality. Since the adoption of the constitution, our glorious old State has been, as she ever will be, true to Democracy, as the stream is true to the ocean. But there is a higher feeling than that to urge us on in this contest. Principles are at stake that are as dear to our country as the life-blood of her sons.

It is to decide whether our country shall still march on with giant strides to greatness and glory, guided by the genius of Democracy, or whether, now in the first year of her blushing youth, with a face radiant with hope, with eyes fixed on the future, with a heart bounding with life, with every limb elastic with motion, and every sinew swelling with strength, she is to become curbed, confined and bound by doubts and fears; every aspiration checked and every hope blighted, until disease and death shall gnaw at her vitals. (Tremendous applause.) Yes, my countrymen, since the last national struggle principles have been advanced that should be howled out in the desert air. They would chain man to the Promethean rock of his nativity—they would block the wheels of progress—they would retard the growth of the world—they would strike at the root of Republicanism, and dry up the fountains of liberty. (Loud cheers.) Yes, gentlemen, in this "Land of Heaven's peculiar grace,

The heritage of Nature's noblest race;"

here in the land whose virgin soil was never polluted by the tread of a tyrant, (and if it were it would be like the serpent upon the shores of Ireland—to touch it would be to die. (Great cheering.) Here in this land, where Washington lived and fought, where La Fayette bled and Montgomery died, they would proclaim that a man, no matter how gifted in intellect or noble in nature, if he was not born within certain geographical limits he is to be stripped of his rights, or if born within these limits, if he desires to worship his God around the altar of his faith, he is to be made a slave in the land that his fathers fought for, and for which he himself is ever ready to die. (Enthusiastic applause.) What matters it where a man was born, or before what altar he adores, when the great Giver of all good, upon the morning of the Creation, said: "Let there be light, and there was light." When He brought this beautiful world into existence by His word, when He chained the ocean to its limits and made the dry land appear, and when, in His mercy, God called forth Man—not kings or conquerors—but he called Man forth and made him master of it all, he has a right to go where'er he likes. The sea that carries him upon its bosom may make him desire that he should live upon the soil that his own free thoughts may take him to. I speak it with profound respect when I say that most of those that I see before me are Protestants, I am free to say that I am a Catholic—(great applause) —and glory in my creed, the creed of Columbus and of Carroll, venerable for its antiquity and sanctified by the services of Saints.

It is the religion in which I was born, and it is the one in which I shall die. Its sacred behests allow me to exercise my duties here as a man, and fit me for hope of bliss beyond the grave. Though I was born upon this soil, and though I love it as I do my life, and would give ten thousand lives to save it, I am to be told that my religion is to be a barrier to my advancement. Arise my countrymen one and all, and blast these principles with the lightning of a people's wrath.

In every contest that we have heretofore waged, it has been an honorable warfare with our fellow-countrymen. The glorious Whig party have battled well for the Union, and they only differ in questions as to its prosperity and perpetuity. It is dear to them as it is dear to us, and to every true American; but now differences have grown in among ourselves, and these men are trying to create dissensions that must end in the dissolution and death of the Republic. Where, in all the earth, is there a land so free and happy as ours? Where are the people respected as they are here?

Mr. Dogherty, in conclusion, said: I feel proud of the sight that has gladdened my eyes to-night. I will go back to my native home and tell my friends that New York, having reconciled the differences that existed between them, will stand by us in the coming struggle. Then the voice of political dissension will subside, and Democracy will triumph, the Union be preserved, and a Te Deum rise from nations rather than from States, in one loud cry of "God be praised!"

Mr. Dogherty retired amid unbounded demonstrations of applause.

Gen. H. Walbridge, whose appearance was greeted with loud and continued plaudits, gave an able exposition of the state of the navy of the United States, and struck at the barriers at present existing against the promotion of junior officers of the service.

Gen. Walbridge's speech elicited the utmost attention, and was heartily applauded throughout. He closed amid a deafening round of cheers.

The Hon. David L. Seymour of New York next addressed the meeting. He expressed the great satisfaction he enjoyed in communing with the Democracy of New York; and when he beheld that great body of enlightened, patriotic and determined men that had so long maintained the Democratic cause, his bosom swelled with emotion, and he felt deeply grateful that he had the opportunity of seeing them. His heart felt cheered, his hopes raised, confidence inspired; and he would go home into the country, into the heart of the State, and proclaim to their brother Democrats there, that the old Democracy of New York, so often victorious, is as sure, as true, and strong, and stands as firm now as she did in 1844, when they, and they alone, achieved the great victory which elevated to the Presidential chair James K. Polk. (Cheers.)

Mr. Lochraine, of Georgia, was next introduced to the audience. He believed that in this crisis of the country, we should all stand by our arms. It was a glorious sight to stand here and see the re-united democracy. He had heard that a black republican cloud had overshadowed the country, and that the Union was in danger; but this meeting assured him that the Union was safe, and that this government should be as eternal as eternity. The spirit of the Revolution, he now believed, still survived, and was consecrated in the hearts of the democratic party. So far as Fillmore is concerned, he is deserted by his own friends. He is in bad company. Those who were once with him, who love the Union, have come over to the support of Buchanan and Breckinridge. (Applause.) There is no danger from the Catholics. They have no such impious work as to overthrow this Union. Mr. L. went on to review the principles of the Americans, denouncing them as opposed to the Constitution, and to the principles upon which our fathers established the republic. He also denounced Fremont as a traitor to his country, who is unworthy the support of any man who loves the Union; reiterating the scare-crow of Fillmore at Albany, that the South won't submit. He fully indorsed the rule laid down by Mr. Buchanan, in relation to stealing Cuba. Put up a man, said he, who will support the Ostend platform. (Loud and prolonged applause.) He went in for Nicaragua, and believed Walker was the George Washington of that country. The republicans ought not to succeed, because they are opposed to the principles promulgated in the Ostend manifesto, and because they would not be in favor of admitting Nicaragua into the Union. He believed the American people were in favor of the sentiments of the Ostend circular, and therefore be believed that Mr. Buchanan was sure to be elected.

At the close of Mr. Lochraine's speech it was announced that a procession would be formed, headed by a band of music, to proceed to the St. Nicholas and serenade several distinguished Buchaneers supposed to be there.

Outside of Tammany a most exciting and enthusiastic meeting, or series of meetings were held. It was tremendous. At one time, from the extent of the vast multitude, sixeeen speakers were at the same time, at different points, addressing the meeting. P. Gallagher, W. J. Rose, of the Daily News, Hon. Thos. Munday, C. Pearce, of Philadelphia, Hon. Sam'l Bard, of Louisiana, and others, were applauded vociferously while addressing the Democracy. It was, even in the words of an opponent, the greatest meeting ever held here.

Special Notices.

Caution to the Public.—To distinguish the genuine magnetic powder, for the destruction of insects, from poisonous imitations, it is necesary to examine the wrapper. See that four national medals—those of England, France, Belgium, and the United States—are engraved thereon. Be sure also that a lithographic fac simile of Lyon's signature appears both on the wrapper and label. This caution is necessary to protect the proprietor from fraud and the public from danger and disappointment. The leading scientific societies, and the first chemists of Europe and America, have pronounced the magnetic powder the only poisonous insect bane in the world, as well as the most effective and fatal means for the destruction of bed-bugs, roaches, fleas, ants, flies, moths, &c., that was ever prepared or sold. The proprietors of the principal city hotels endorse it. Come and see the testimonials of Prince Albert, ex-President Fillmore, and hundreds of the nobility of Europe, as well as the sovereigns of America. The magnetic pills, for the extermination of rats and mice, are endorsed with equal emphasis by all who have tried them. Call and see the medals, diplomas, government orders, scientific certificates, letters, &c., at the Central Depot, No. 424 Broadway.

This State, says the South Carolina Times of the 7th, with a white population of two hundred and seventy six thousand, five hundred and sixty-five, a total population of six hundred and sixty-eight thousand five hundred and seven, and a federal representative population of five hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and thirteen, had eight colleges in 1839, two hundred and two academies, with seven thousand four hundred and sixty-seven pupils, and seven hundred and twenty-four schools with seventeen thousand eight hundred and thirty-eight scholars. There were, at that time, twenty-six libraries in the State, the aggregate number of volumes of which were one hundred and seven thousand, four hundred and ninety-two. Since that time, the Furnam University at Greenville, the Wofford College, the Spartanburg Female College, and an Episcopal College at Spartanburg, the Yorkville Female Institute and the Yorkville Military Academy at Yorkville, and several other institutions of high grade for the education of both males and females, have been established and are all now in the full tide of success, answering the most sanguine expectations and meeting completely the wants of their friends and the public.

The community of Madison county was suddenly startled by the elopement of John E. Townsend with the step-daughter of his overseer, on Friday night, the 25th of July. He took with him, says the Athens (Ala.) Herald, it is supposed, cash funds to the amount of over $100,000, belonging to the assets of the estate of his uncle, Edmund Townsend, of which he was the co-administrator; as also funds obtained from two commission houses in Huntsville, in drafts to the amount of $35,000 or $40,000, leaving his wife and children and all his property, growing crops, &c., except two negroes. Attachments, up to Monday, 28th, to the amount of $120,000 had been placed in the hands of the Sheriff, and levied on his property.

The Miramichi (P. E.) Gleanor states that a short time ago two young girls were killed by lightning in a house in Cockfish, Kent County. They were engaged in washing dishes at a table, where they continued to stand, though dead, until the father of one of them laid hands on them when they both fell down. When the storm commenced the eldest girl, who was churning, said that it was not right to be at that work while it was thundering. She then went to the table and commenced washing dishes. The woman was severely injured in the arm and leg.

The venerable tree known as the Charter Oak, so celebrated for the historical memories associated with it, and which stood on the old Wyllis estate, at Hartford, Conn., fell during the storm of Wednesday night (20th), with a tremendous crash, leaving but six feet of the stump. It is chiefly memorable as the tree in which was concealed the famous charter on the 9th of May, 1689, and was probably a veteran of the forest at the time Columbus discovered the continent.

We find the following in the Memphis Appeal of the 12th: "A private letter, received in this city yesterday, from Dresden, Tenn., dated 6th inst., states that Hon. Lynn Boyd shot one of the Black Republican electors the day before, about thirty miles from Dresden. The person shot is supposed to be George T. Blakely. They were in a discussion. Blakely drew his pistol, when Boyd turned and shot him. No further particulars given."

Mr. Samuel W. Chambers, of Boone county, Kentucky is about prosecuting a claim for real estate in Philadelphia, valued at over $20,000,000. The estate consists of about twenty acres of land in one of the best parts of that city. It was granted to his great grandfather by Wm. Penn, in 1769. The deed was in possession of an ancestor at Chester, when that town was taken by the British, and carried to the state archives for safety, and is now in Harrisburg.

The Dove, during her trip down the Kentucky river last week, when near Marion, Ky., was invaded by clouds of flies, which literally covered the boat all over. They are the species known as the lake fly, with their bodies and wings about an inch in length. They covered the boiler deck to the depth of a foot or more. The cabin was filled, and they had to be swept to the guard, and shovelled overboard.

At Ocala, Fla., on the 3d inst., Dr. W. J. C. Rogers, proprietor of a drug-store, while quarreling with his wife at the dinner-table, jumped from his seat and seizing a loaded gun, discharged its contents into her side, causing death in two hours. He was immediately arrested. The unfortunate act is attributable to the too free use of liquor by her husband.

The Lockport Journal says that a man named Dan Smith, while bathing in that place, on Sunday, was attacked by a large fish, six feet in length, which bit him on the instep, producing a dangerous wound. A branch of the tibeal artery was nearly severed, and the man was in danger of bleeding to death, when a physician was sent for, who stopped the flow of blood.

The Free Trader (Mo.) says: Silas Rogers, overseer for Mr. Thomas J. Brown, of Buffalo, Wilkinson county, was killed on the night of the 1st inst., by the negroes. Nine have been arrested and put in jail, and have confessed to their participation in the horrid deed.

The number of hogs in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Kentucky, at this time, is estimated at 1,943,334, which, at three dollars a head, a fair average of value of stock, would amount to $32,830,000. If fat when sold, they would average ten dollars a head, amounting to $109,433,340!

The idea of making paper out of basswood is likely to prove successful. Mr. Beardsley, of Little Falls, the inventor, it is stated, is going to manufacture that kind of paper for the N. Y. Times.

It is feared the old razee frigate Independence 74, is lost. She went, with eight hundred souls on board, including Com. Mervine and Mr. Benson, to survey the guano islands, and has not been heard from since she left Honolulu on the 15th of February.

C. M. James and Alfred Hyde, two fellows who set up a bogus "banking house" in Chicago, with the intention of swindling farmers by buying their produce and paying in worthless bills, have been arrested.

It is stated that there is at Saratoga a fine looking Indian girl, only fourteen years of age who has a child three years old.

In East Bridgewater, last week, a man had his stocking and boot taking off by lightning, without injuring him.

The editor of the Springfield Argus says that the indications are that Connecticut will go for Buchanan.

The Pulaski (Oswego County) Democrat, hitherto a Free Soil paper, comes out this week for Buchanan.

City News.

A woman named Mary was arraigned at the Sessions court, by her sisters of the apple-trade, for sundry attempts to monopolize the business upon the corners of the streets, by upsetting the stands of her rivals, &c.

"Well, Mary," said the judge, "what have you to say to all these charges?"

"May it please your worship," replied Mary, with great meekness, "I've niver done the things at all, as they say I've done; but, your worship, the other wimin' is the one's that begun it, yer worship; an' old Michael Donehughe, the other wimin's husband, yer worship, has been puttin' 'um up to it ivir since I commenced selling the apples. I've six children, yer worship, an' git an honest livin' if they let me alone, but when they don't let me alone, I don't let them alone; and so when they upset my stand, I upset theirs; and when they gits away my customers, I gits away theirs, yer worship; an' if yer worship will let me go, I'll behave as well as they do."

The Judge—"This seems to be a regular neighborhood quarrel; and under the circumstances I will suspend judgment; and if you don't stop your quarrels I will send you all to the Penitentiary for six months."

Mary—"Thank ye, yer worship, an' I'll behave as ivir they do."

A difficulty arose between John and Elizabeth Warder, on the night of the 18th, when the wife, who is a strong, athletic woman, assaulted the husband, and a desperate fight ensued. In the frenzy of anger, she got a pistol and shot at her husband, the ball taking effect in the back part of the head and shoulders, and inflicting a severe wound.

Ellen McGuire, an Irish woman, 23 years of age, for some itme in circumstances of utter destitution, during her sickness and confinement, some three weeks ago, was left not only without proper medical attendance, but the common necessities of life. Her sufferings drove her to insanity, and on the 18th inst., with her child, three weeks' old, in her arms, she threw herself in the river. They were both drowned.

The Fulton ferry-boat Nassau ran over a small boat, manned by five soldiers belonging to Fort Hamilton, and stove her to pieces, on last Friday. One of the crew, named Edward Muldroon, was drowned; the other four were picked up by small boats.

BUCHANAN AND THE PRESS.

The Lancaster American, a journal which has opposed the Democratic party, has recently come out for Mr. Buchanan, and it assigns the following reasons:

Because he is our neighbor and friend, and because he has done more good to the poor of this city than all of his traducers put together. Because he is a statesman of the first order of intellect, and is vastly the superior in every respect of all his competitors. Because he is an honest man, and will administer the government honestly and faithfully. Because he will be the President, not of a faction, or a section of the Union, but of the whole American people; and will know no North, no South, no East, no West, but treat all alike, fairly and impartially, in the true spirit of the Constitution. Because we know him, and can truly say that he is one of the purest, as he is among the ablest statesmen now living. For these and other reasons which we might give had we the room, we prefer James Buchanan for the Presidency, and shall do what we can to promote his election. Voter! can you ask a more solid personal reason?

Is Democracy sectional? asks the Washington Sentinel, and thus replies to the question:

It seems to be supposed in certain quarters, that because the South will vote in solid column for Buchanan, he is a sectional candidate; and a justification is sought for those who vote for Fremont as the candidate of the North.

Let no man be deceived by this shallow and unfounded pretence. Mr. Buchanan is the very opposite of sectionalism—is the embodiment of a sound constitutionalism, which recognizing the equal rights of every section, bestows upon all that patriotic feeling which has pre-eminently distinguished his forty years of public service. The only pretended evidence of his sectionalism is, that one section votes for him in Massachusetts.

Surely no one expected that Fremont would get a Southern electoral vote. Those who urge this as a proof of Mr. Buchanan's sectionalism, cannot base it upon the fact that the South refuses to vote for Fremont. Every Black Republican knows that such a vote would be a folly in the South, equal to its injustice in the North.

The secret of the whole matter is this: The South are the assailed party. The Republicans have an exclusive Northern organization. They base their hope of success upon a Northern vote exclusively. Their counsels, their nominations, are exclusively Northern. They are so for the purpose—not of defence from assault, but of offence against the assailed South.

Can the South meet such an organization, except by unity of action?

But there is one other important view. The South is in a minority of fifty votes in the electoral colleges. The North is in the majority. A divided minority must be beaten. The South dare not divide with such a foe in front. But in addition—the North with its majority of fifty, threatens a greater hostile unanimity than ever before. If it be perfectly united, the South must be beaten. The hope of the South in the Union must be in disconnecting from the horde of Northern fanaticism, a sufficient force of constitutional men to unite with the solid vote in protecting their assailed rights, and defending the union of the States. That gone, the Union to the South is WITHOUT HOPE! The South does not ask for anything but equal rights, equal respect, and a faithful performance by the North of her covenanted vows to the South.

The South have in emphatic terms repudiated the dogmas which are the basis of the party organization whose exponent Mr. Fillmore is. She cannot abandon a candidate whose consistency upon the slavery question is superior to Mr. Fillmore's, and one who seconds her in her opposition to the false Americanism of Mr. Fillmore's party, in order to take him up. Could her devotion to principle be consistent with such a course, which could be designated by no less term of reproach than that of folly and weakness?

But were there no objection to the views of those who support Mr. Fillmore at the North, (and they are abundant to a Southern man,) what hope of success in the North, can Mr. Fillmore have, even were Mr. Buchanan withdrawn? With the entire Southern vote in his favor, Mr. Fillmore would be beaten in a single-handed contest with Fremont. Because the very objection urged against Mr. Buchanan that he is the sectional candidate, would then lie against Mr. Fillmore; and every supporter of Fillmore now, who has any anti-Southern proclivities would rush to the standard of Fremont. Besides, every foreigner, every Catholic vote, which now clings to the Democracy for a defence, and as their shield, would refuse to coalesce with those whose foundation principles are proscriptive of their sacred rights. Every Northern opponent of Know-Nothingism, in the ranks of the Democracy, would be lost to the national standard in a single-handed contest between Fillmore and Fremont.

It is thus obvious, that not only is an advocacy, a written advocacy of Mr. Buchanan, by the South, the only hope of the Union as a protection to the South, but the idea of combining the national vote upon Fremont, even if desirable, is utterly impracticable.

BUCHANAN IN ILLINOIS.—We observe that persons at a distance seem to put some faith in the statements that there is a possibility that Illinois will vote for Fremont. We know that it has been said and positively averred by Black Republican orators, that Illinois would vote the opposition ticket. Such an idea when expressed here is considered too stale even for a joke. No man in his senses thinks of this State voting for any one but Buchanan. As we said when Mr. Buchanan was nominated, the Democracy of Illinois will give him a larger majority, in proportion to the entire vote, than he will obtain in Pennsylvania. Any Pennsylvania editor who wants to lose a hat on that proposition may apply for our measure at once.

In fact, there is no real contest in this State upon the Presidency. All men know that Buchanan will carry this State by twice the majority which Mr. Pierce had in 1852. The contest in Illinois has dwindled down to a mere race for local offices. A fierce hostility has been erected against Col. Richardson. Against him and not against Buchanan is the battle raging. That Col. Richardson will be elected, there is no doubt; that his majority will equal that of Mr. Buchanan we have not the slightest hesitation in believing. The Democracy of Illinois are determined that "Old Buck" shall not be sold by them. They will vote for Buchanan in a solid body, and we do not know a man in this State who will sacrifice Richardson. Col. R., in his speeches, we know, tells the voters that if they can swell Buchanan's majority by dropping him, to do so; that a tremendous majority for Buchanan in Illinois would be more gratifying to him than his own election. Still, we know that with twelve or fifteen thousand majority to spare, the gallant Democracy of Illinois, who have ejected Wentworth and Trumbull, because of their Abolition tendencies, will listen to no offer that could tend to give Bissell a distinction to which he had sacrificed all claim.

Illinois, we repeat, is certain for Buchanan by a very large majority.—Chicago Times.

In reply to the question, "Is Mr. Fremont a Catholic?" the Bangor Journal says: "We find that the Black Republican organs are afraid that they have not yet sufficiently proved that he is not, and so they keep agitating the question. At best, it is but a trifling matter, and of no consequence at all. We think he is not now a Catholic; but from what we have been able to learn, it appears that this was his religious faith once, which he abandoned some time ago. If he was honest in so doing, so be it. To his own conscience he must stand or fall.

The Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer alleges that there are two Buchanan Electoral tickets in New York. We would inform that paper, as well as some Democratic Southern papers which have made a similar mistake, that there is but one ticket for Presidential Electors nominated by any party in the State of New York, and that there never has been any other Electoral ticket nominated in this State for the present campaign. That ticket is the one that stands at the head af our columns (Buck and Breck).—N. Y. Daily News.

Speaking of the testimony in reference to Fremont's "Romanism," the Albany Statesman says: "There is, or recently was in existence in this city a letter from a Catholic, who holds a position in the confidence and near the person of Bishop Hughes, asserting unequivocally that John C. Fremont until recently was a Roman Catholic.

The Beginning of the End—The Death-knell of Quackery.

"Oh, blessed health!" exclaims Sterne, "'tis thou who enlargest the soul and openest all its powers to receive instruction and to relish virtue. He that has thee has little else to wish for; he that is so wretched as to want thee, wants everything with thee." The truth of this apostrophe every one must acknowledge; poor Sterne spoke from sad experience. And yet, familiar as every man is with the truth herein expressed, no mortal could compute the members who ruin themselves in body, mind, and fortune by neglecting to employ the proper remedies when health fails. How is this neglect to be remedied? The evil has become so consecrated by age, that the man who undertakes to amend it requires no ordinary hardihood. Such a man is Professor Holloway.

The honest laborer in the cause of humanity finds no sadder discouragement, than in the complacent indifference with which people prefer rather to endure a long-existing evil, than to incur the troble necessary to get rid of it. The more aged an error has become, the more difficult it is to remove it. This is true in an especial manner of the art of healing, as it was known and practised before the advent of this wonderful genius whose mission it has been to re-establish the treatment of human ailments in a rational way.

One by one the venerable abuses that have disgraced the past are disappearing, and among the rest, the errors that have crept into medical practice have got their dismission papers, and are obliged, to use a vulgar phrase, "to cut and run." Where, it may be asked, are the proofs? Proofs! Why, there is one great, patent, palpable fact, which has been staring the world in the face for the last twenty years, and working its way through popular prejudice into popular favor with a success which is the most unquestionable evidence of its power as a proof. The medicines of Professor Holloway have been silently but powerfully effecting a change in the science of physic which the world itself has begun to wonder at. It is well known that the causes of all the diseases and sufferings to which people are subject are very few although their indications may be numerously varied. The old plan of curing diseases was by affecting their results, without affecting their primary causes. Professor Holloway initiated a new mode of treatment by the discovery of his Pills and Ointment, which, while immediately grappling with the ultimate symptoms, reach also to the seat of the disease, and eradicate the first causes, thus destroying all subsequent liability to similar affections. We do not mean to praise these Pills and Ointment. We confine ourselves to stating facts, and are perfectly satisfied that no eulogy is needed. They speak for themselves.—Mobile Register.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter, giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

MRS. HAYES' SYRUP.

For Dysentery and Bowel Complaints.

WARRANTED to cure the worst cases in less than twenty-four hours, if used according to directions. It has stood the test of thirty-five years and has never been known to fail, even when the most eminent physicians had pronounced the patient beyond the reach of medicine. Over two thousand satisfactory references and certificates can be produced, sufficient to prove its superiority over all other preparations for these complaints.

The Syrup can be given to a child a week old with perfect safety. It is pleasant to the taste, and harmless in its composition, it being free from opium, alcohol, &c. Prepared and sold by Mrs. M. Hayes, 176 Fulton st., Brooklyn. Sold also by Joseph W. Hayes, 159 Atlantic st., H. Parker, cor. of Fulton Avenue and Cumberland street, M. Evans, corner of Myrtle and Classon avenues, Brooklyn. Particular attention is requested to the Pannus Corrium or Leather Cloth Boots and Shoes, for those troubled with corns, bunions or tenderness of the feet. Its qualities for summer boots or shoes, surpass anything ever got up in this country for real comfort, as it keeps the feet perfectly cool, and at the same time is susceptible of the finest polish; for a dress boot more so than any French calfskin, with one half the labor. Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a subscriber to Mr. O'Mahoney's translation of the Foras Feasa ar Erinn.

That is a book long wanted, and which the "Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Eliot Hudson had lived, it wouldhave been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes, as Mr. O'Mahony.

I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, JOHN MITCHEL.

Their Book Trade.

The old established house of Benziger Brothers, Eisiedeln, well known to many of the Hierarchy and the Rev. Clergy of the United States who have visited Switzerland, established this house in New-York four years ago, and they trust they will receive for the greatly increased advantages they offer, a continuance of that support, which for a period of over forty years has enabled them to build up, at the Pilgrimage of Our Lady of the Hermits (Einsiedeln) an establishment in which over four hundred persons are daily employed in the fabrication of the various articles that are used in the Church.

They desire particularly to call attention to their publications of PRAYER and DEVOTIONAL BOOKS, in German, French, Italian and Latin, consisting of over 200 different sorts. Being in immediate and constant intercourse with nearly all the principal publishers of Europe, they are enabled to offer a large assortment of standard THEOLOGICAL and LITURGICAL WORKS, among which are, the editions of Mechline, Paris, Ratisbone, &c., at exceedingly low prices.

They are also prepared to supply any of the English Catholic Books published in the United States, at publishers' lowest prices.

An assortment of Dutch and Flemish Prayer Books, and of German School and Story Books.

2. They very respectfully invite an inspection of their extensive assortment of

Vestments and Church Vessels,

and, in doing so, feel confident that their stocks is more varied and of superior fabrication than any of the kind heretofore introduced into the United States, and from their facilities for purchasing in Europe, are enabled to sell at a lower price than any other house in the country.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on applicaiion to the Publishers personally, or by letter enclosing six cents in postage stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, whico will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteomed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered in most instances at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, etc., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed the present Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

Study the Life of Mary!

OF

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

(JAMES B. KIRKER,)

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing, in monthly parts, at twenty-five cents each, and with the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

ARCHBISHOP OF NEW-YORK,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

By the

RIGHT REV. ROMUALD GENTILUCCI,

Chamberlain of Honor to His Holiness,

Dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness

POPE PIUS IX.,

ILLUSTRATED with fine steel engravings, and vignettes, borders, and initials, designed expressly for this work. This Life, published at Rome in 1848, by a Prelate high in the esteem of the Holy Father, is approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace, and has already been translated into other languages. Amid the many lives that have appeared, Gentilucci's will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of Ecclesiastical History that can in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of our Lord, as handed down in the loving traditions of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

It is a book for the studious as well as for the fervent Christian; a book for every one who seeks to rouse in his heart feelings of devotion for Her, whom the unerring Judge selected for the greatest honor which the human mind can conceive.

Conditions of the Work.

Gentilucci's Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a steel engraving in every number, and several fine woodcuts. Printed on fine paper, from new type, it will, when complete, form a most unique and beautiful volume of six to seven hundred and fifty pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

No other work of our day, on the same subject, can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of a learned and devoted son of the blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most Holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are not more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in the book. The translator has performed his task admirably.—Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers, whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truthteller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the Bible of the same enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

This work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work, translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

Inducement.

Each subscriber to this splendid work will receive with the last number a magnificent steel engraving, suitable for framing, of the

MOST. REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

ARCHBISHOP OF NEW-YORK.

Canvassers will find it to their advantage to address the publishers.

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of their departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; for persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

European News.

The English war steamer Gladiator, has returned from the Isle of Serpents to Constantinople, and reports on the island fifty Turkish and eight Russian soldiers. There was no armed seizure of the island, as was reported. The island is nothing but a bare rock, of very limited size, and contains only one building, with the Turks and Russians living together, and the latter are treated by the former as their guests. The Gladiator had left again for the Black Sea, with new instructions of a more positive nature. The English press protests strongly against the indifference expressed by the French government as to whether the Isle of Serpents belongs to Russia or Turkey. The proof that the Isle of Serpents, called also Fidonisi, is very valuable, is, that all the allied fleets made it a rendezvous before landing their armies at Eupatoria.

Galignani's Messenger says: "An immense crowd was assembled on Tuesday afternoon, on the bridges and quays of the Seine, to witness the movements of a well-dressed man who was walking on the river between the Pont du Carousel and the lock at the Mint, apparently with the greatest ease. He had each foot in a small triangular box, securely fastened with straps round his legs, and in his hands he carried a long balancing-pole, similar to those used by rope-dancers, except that at each end was attached a large inflated bladder. When getting off his balance, he dipped the end of the pole, and the resistance caused by the bladder touching the water restored him to his equilibrium."

From the United Service Gazette we learn that additional barrack accommodation is to be constructed at Alborough House, Dublin, for a battalion of infantry, with a canteen and shed for drill. Increased barrack arrangements are to be made for married soldiers and staff-sergeants, and land to be purchased for drill ground. Additional barrack accommodation is to be made at Great Ship-street Barracks, to contain a battalion of infantry; and extensive alterations and repairs and increased barrack accommodation are also ordered at the Pigeon-house Fort, Dublin.

Mr. Waterhouse, the Queen's jeweler, Dublin, has produced a brooch, and will devote the proceeds of its sale to the "Nightingale Fund." The tablet represents a wounded soldier, to whom a female is administering relief; this is surrounded by a motto, which in its turn is enwreathed by a rich garland of laurel tied with a ribbon and surmounted by a crown. The design is based upon the jewel presented to Miss Nightingale by the Queen, but it is so altered as to suit the purpose of a brooch for ordinary wear. It is very beautiful, and does high credit to the eminent Dublin jeweler who has produced it.

The remains of the allied fleet have not yet left, and France and Turkey having no disposable ships, four English ships have joined Admiral Stewart's squadron now cruising before Baltschik. The evacuation of Turkish territory by French troops terminated on the 15th, and the Gendarmerie would leave by the 18th. Tekeddin Pasha is appointed Governor of Kars.

The Bishop of Montauban, France, in a recent pamphlet which all the priests in his diocese are directed to read, advances the following claim for his order: "Heretics, though separated from the (Romish) Church, are still subject to her authority and that of her lawful pastors, as a son who rebels against his father's authority is still really subject to all the duties imposed upon him. By the same title, the Bishop's authority applies to all Christians in his diocese."

From every part of the United Kingdom the harvest reports are of a favorable character, and but little doubt is now entertained that the grain crops will be at least a fair average in quantity and quality. In Scotland the crops are very heavy. With respect to potatoes there is a general concurrence of evidence that the crop, though not entirely free from disease in some parts of England, Ireland and Scotland, promises to be abundant and excellent. The late rains have been very beneficial to green crops.

A report was circulated in the Paris Bourse, that there has been an attempt at insurrection in Naples. It was not, however, true, and from the precaution taken to repress, any attempt at rising is not likely. The secret Liberal Press has, however, just issued another proclamation to the people, calling on them to agitate firmly and quietly.

Churches in Van Diemen's Land.—The Rev. Mr. Miller, minister of one of the Independent Churches in Van Diemen's Land, has just returned to the English Government £500, which some of his people many years ago had accepted from the Treasury for building the chapel. He thought that consistency with the principles held by that sect, demanded the return of the money.

This statement has created great excitement throughout Italy.

EXECUTION OF HETHERINGTON AND BRACE.

On Tuesday, July 29, Joseph Hetherington and Philander Brace were executed by the Vigilance Committee at San Francisco. We extract the following particulars from the San Francisco Herald:

Hetherington was a tall man, with large black whiskers, and looked quite unconcerned. He was dressed in black and wore a straw hat. Brace appeared to be a very young man. He ascended the scaffold with his hands in the pockets of his pantaloons. He wore a brown coat and light vest. So careless and unconcerned did both appear, that nobody would, from looking at their countenance, come to the conclusion that they were the criminals who in a few moments were to be launched into eternity.

The most conspicuous of the crowd assembled on the scaffold was the hangman. He was attired in a black domino of muslin and also a black muslin cap. He was, of course, the "observed of all observers." We never in our life looked upon a more villainous countenance. He seemed to have been cut out by nature for the office which he filled.

After arriving on the scaffold, Hetherington and Brace took a position side by side. The former on the north and the latter on the south side. The hangman then removed the cravat from the neck of Brace. Hetherington removed his own cravat. Brace turned to his fellow-victim and shook hands with him. The ropes were then adjusted about both their necks. While the hangman was thus engaged, Hetherington remarked, "Don't put it too tight around my neck—I want to speak to the people." When the rope was adjusted to the satisfaction of the hangman, Hetherington, as calmly and coolly as if he was addressing a public meeting assembled to do him honor, said:

"You may think I am a hard sinner. I appear before you mild and unconcerned. I am to meet my Maker in a few moments. To the best of my knowledge I have not lived one day in my life that I was afraid to meet my Maker. Do not think that I am a murderer. Such is not my case. Bishop Kip has been with me all day—not all day, but during intervals throughout the day."

Brace, who, during the delivery of the above remarks, stood with his hands quite carelessly thrust in his pockets, and who appeared to be intoxicated, said:

"Have you (turning to the reporters, near the gallows,) got that all down. Go on, old horse, (to Hetherington,) and say what you have to say; I don't want you to be talking all day."

Hetherington—I am not more penitent to-day than I ever was in my life.

Brace (squaring himself)—Go on, sir.

Hetherington—In conversation with Dr. Kip to-day, I assured him that I never lived a day that I was afraid—

Brace—Oh, hurry up with your cakes—don't be so long about it.

Hetherington (continuing)—To meet my God.

Brace—I'm not going to stop here so long. I want to meet my doom immediately.

Hetherington—If the gentlemen in whose hands I am wish it, I will stop.

Several voices—Proceed, proceed.

Hetherington—Gentlemen, I do not display any more feeling now than the day on which I was taken into that house; I have——

Brace—I want you all to understand that I, Philander Brace, have been murdered by the Vigilance Committee on the 29th day of July, 1856. Do you understand that?

Hetherington—I still think so. Whenever you say stop, I will stop. I have to add one thing more, and that is, that so far as the killing of Dr. Randall is concerned, I would merely say, that I had only asked a question, when he turned around, and drew a pistol.

Brace—Go on, sir.

Hetherington—I merely wanted to save my own life. I have lived all my life a gentleman, though I am about to end my career on the gallows. I defy the whole world to prove a dishonorable act upon me.

Brace—Go away from me, you son of a b—h, (to the hangman, who was fumbling about his neck.)

Hetherington—In the conversation I had with Bishop Kip——

Brace—I don't care about Dr. Kipps or Dr. Cripps.

Hetherington—What was my last sentence? The conversation with Dr. Kip turned——

Brace—I am drunk. I am all right. I'm a regular thieving son of a b—h.

Hetherington—The conversation turned on Randall, and I told him that I never lived a day that I was not prepared to meet my God.

Brace—Speak out; speak out like a man, sir.

Hetherington—I have merely to add, that I have no hard feelings against any one. I expect that my Redeemer will forgive me. I forgive every man. May the Lord have mercy upon our souls! But, gentlemen, I have to make one remark which few people may credit.

Brace—Go on, old horse.

Hetherington—I have merely to say, that during my trial Mr. Gillespie insulted me very much, but I freely forgive him. I think Mr. Smiley was friendly to me.

Brace (to his companion)—Roll yourself up in the American flag, and die like a son of a b—h.

Hetherington—My witnesses were not summoned.

Brace—Go on, old horse.

Hetherington—No jury on the face of the earth would have convicted me. So far as a fair trial is concerned, I have had no such thing. I am not afraid to meet my God. May the Lord have mercy upon my soul.

Brace—I hope he may, old horse.

Hetherington—I forgive every one. Gentlemen, I am here the spectacle of you all. May the Lord have mercy upon me.

The caps were then adjusted around the necks of both, and Hetherington, when the cap was pulled down, said: "God bless you all! God bless you all! God bless Mr. Fletcher Haight! I wish I could have seen Mr. Henry Haight before I died." Here the bell tolled the fatal knell, and the two were launched into eternity.

The bodies, after swinging idly in the air for the space of half an hour, were cut down and taken possession of by the Coroner. They were laid out last evening in the Coroner's office, in plain coffins, and in the same habiliments in which they were hung. During the evening, the office was visited by crowds of idle and morbid horror-gazers. The countenances of both men looked very natural, and from their placid appearance they probably suffered but little pain.

MURDER OF DR. RANDALL.

It appears that Joseph Hetherington and Dr. Randall have for some time past been at daggers' points in relation to some monetary transactions. From what we can learn, Dr. Randall borrowed a large sum of money from Mr. Hetherington, estimated at from twenty to forty thousand dollars, for which he gave him as security mortgages on his property. When the loan became due, Hetherington ascertained that his securities were not worth a cent, from the fact that previous mortgages had been recorded against the property sufficient to consume the value of the same. Hetherington, as a matter of course, became exasperated against Randall, and bad blood was aroused between the two men. The following statement of the catastrophe we have received from an eye witness. At 3 3-4 o'clock on the afternoon of Thursday, the 24th of July, Mr. Hetherington dropped in at the St. Nicholas Hotel on Sansome street, where he recognized Judge Joseph W. McCorkle. He spoke to the Judge, and asked him, "Will you go with me? I want to meet him face to face."

The Judge advised Hetherington not to have any difficulty; that these were excitable and troublous times, and advised Hetherington not to have any difficulty with Randall. At this time Hetherington recognized Randall, who was at that time standing in the bar-room about ten feet from him, and exclaimed, "There is the scoundrel now," and advancing toward him, caught Dr. Randall by the beard and pulled him with a jerk. Dr. Randall immediately drew a revolver, and Hetherington drew his pistol at the same moment. Our informant states that the first shots were fired so quick and so nearly together that it was impossible to decide who fired first. Dr. Randall discharged three shots from his pistol and Hetherington the same. The second shot of Hetherington took effect, striking Dr. Randall in the head, who retired behind the book-keeper's desk of the hotel, and while in that position Hetherington fired another shot, which did not take effect. The wound of Dr. Randall is over the left eye, near the temple, and will most probably produce death.

LETTER FROM SAN FRANCISCO.

August 5th, 1856.

Editor of the Irish News, New York:

Sir—Since my last nothing of an unusually strange character has occurred. It is true that a couple of human beings have been launched into eternity by a body of men calling themselves the "Vigilance Committee;" but this is nothing in these times. The public feeling has became either indifferent or morbid. The nightly raids of the hirelings of this Committee—their parades through the streets with shouldered muskets and fixed bayonets—their French and Dutch mercenaries galloping to and fro, trying to intimidate—only creates a feeling of contempt in the breast of every true lover of this Republic.

There is no doubt now on the mind of any thinking man here, that the men at the bottom of this movement aimed at the severance of this State from the Union. But there was here, as there was at "Fontenoy," a body of exiles, true to their adopted country, and true to their oaths. There they could neither bribe nor intimidate, and consequently they have failed in their grand object. They must, however, keep up their organization, being in a state of rebellion, and having set all the laws of the Republic at defiance, they know not how to disband.

The few responsible men among them would be glad to get out on any terms; but the bankrupt traders (who form a great portion of their executive) don't wish it, and the foreign hirelings won't allow it. In this position the Executive are now fixed, and something must be done to keep up the excitement, consequently the hanging of Hetherington and Brace. A more brutalizing scene I never witnessed; and the morbid taste that this movement has given for blood was evidenced by the crowd of women mixed among that surging and swaying assemblage. A gentleman of long standing here and whose brother fills one of the highest judicial offices in this State, remarked to me, "I am glad to see how few American or Irish ladies there are present at this beastly scene." Both he and I, with many others, then walked off in disgust. For the particulars of the scene I refer you to the San Francisco Sun.

All good citizens look forward to the next mail for something decisive from Washington. It is the hope alone of action from there that keeps them so still. If Pierce don't act, and that promptly, he will leave behind him a very small Presidential name. Trusting to his non-interference, the Committee still sit, their foriegn mercenaries figure about, armed and insulting. They still hold Judge Terry, of the Supreme Court, a captive; and in order to show you the feeling of this Committee, I annex you a paragraph from one of their hireling organs:

"In regard to Terry's case, there are hardly two opinion sustained by the mass of the Committee as to what should be done with him. At least twenty members of my company, with whom I have talked upon the subject, say, emphatically, 'Give the Judge a choice between being hung, and resigning the office he has disgraced and leaving the country forthwith, never to return.' The regret was very generally expressed on Tuesday afternoon, that Terry was not on the gallows with Brace and Hetherington, to share their fate.

"No one would like more than myself to see the labors of the Vigilance Committee terminated; but it will be nonsense and labor lost for them to disband until their work is thoroughly done. It was said in my hearing on Tuesday that nothing could be done with Terry—that he must be suffered quietly to depart. What folly! Restore back to the law and murder party their ablest, most unscrupulous and daring leader; reseat the Judge upon the Supreme Bench, and let me ask, what security for our necks shall we of the Vigilance Committee have? Never, I say, permit this man Terry to preside again in a Court of Justice in California. Give him his choice of the halter, or resignation and banishment."—Evening Bulletin, July 31.

Just fancy language of this sort used towards one of the Judges of the Supreme Court, a man of high and irreproachable character as a citizen and a Judge, and from it you can draw your conclusions as to the character of this organization.

Regarding financial matters, they are even worse than when I wrote to you last. Foreign capital is being rapidly withdrawn. Real estate has fallen at least 50 per cent. There is no confidence among business men, and the time is fast approaching when those "gingerbread merchants" will complete their work with a general "burst up."

Here, too, sir, is another precious specimen of the feeling pervading many of the members of this Committee. From the Sun, August 1st, I clip the annexed:

Great Banking Scheme.—The Evening Mob Organ has a correspondence after its own heart. Said correspondent, in yesterday's Bulletin, advocates an attack upon the vaults of a well-known banking house of this city by the mobites, first making prisoners of the owners of the money in the vaults, and either hang or ship them off. All this is to be carried out under false colors, the piratical flag not to be shown until after the money is got hold of. So fearful is this land pirate that he and his gang will not get hold of the cash he so much covets, that he calls upon the "Vigilance Committee to act at once" in the matter, and says "it is demanded by all the people." What glorious times the mobites would have here, breaking into the vaults of the banks, and carrying off lots of gold and silver. It would save many of them from ruin, and others, the "seedy" portion, who have not known what it is to earn an honest dollar in their lives, could live like lords in the future off the money thus acquired. No doubt this is a capital idea for the mobites, and one long entertained by them. One bank thus sacked would but whet the cravings of "the people," and bank after bank would be dug into and rifled of the gold and silver contained in them. Such mining operations would, no doubt, pay better than working in the mining grounds of the interior; besides, it would require little or no labor, a particular feature for such seekers after gold.

Foreign capitalists have takon the alarm in time, and the millions they have withdrawn from our State within the past two months, will be saved to them at least. The times are becoming desperate; affairs may change greatly here within a month or so, and we do not wonder that the mobites are clamorous that the work of robbing the banks should commence "at once." Yes, what is to be done should be done quickly, lest some "higher power" should interfere, and the grand scheme be blown up along with the schemers.

The Bulletin has issued its fiat, let the Vigilance Committee obey.

News from the interior, too, is sad. The flourishing little city of Nevada is laid in ashes. Many of your old friends have suffered—and you had some warm ones there. Placerville is also in ashes. Arrowville and Georgetown have suffered the same fate, and Angles Camp is utterly destroyed. Marysville has severely suffered from attempts at burning, and our own city, San Francisco, has not even escaped the attempts of the satellites of this lawless mob. Brannan's Express Buildings were attempted to be fired a few nights since, but owing to the presence of mind of a gentleman passing at the time, it was prevented. Indeed, there need now be little fear of any extensive fire in San Francisco. The Fire Department is so thoroughly organized and conducted that few fears are entertained on this score. They are a brave, fearless and prompt body of men. I regret to say that many of them (owing to existing circumstances here) are leaving for Nicaragua. The city may yet feel their loss. Apropos to this, I understand that Col. E. J. C. Kewan is up here from Nicaragua, and I understand endorses all you have said in your journal in regard to Walker and his action in Central America. I hope in a day or two to meet the gallant Colonel, when we will have a full talk over the matter, the result of which you may expect by next mail. The Colonel is a brave, gallant and accomplished gentleman, and one who will acquit himself honorably on any field. His acts in Central America speak for themselves. Strange to say, he boasts of Irish blood. Success to Col. Kewan and his gallant associate Walker.

There is little more for me to refer to. One thing I should not, however, have overlooked. It is a strange fact that almost without an exception every English and Scotchman in this city, have leagued themselves with this Committee. Republicans look out. Monarchy won't spare its gold to sow disunion among you. Sunday has passed over without any thing remarkable. The banks have not been broken into yet; for the present "quiet reigns in Warsaw."

Here is a specimen of this Committee's style of working. One would suppose they had taken lessons from the Autocrats of Russia:

The Case of Bulger—Rooms of the Committee of Vigilance.—A resolution was passed on the 4th of June, 1856, by the Executive Committee, sentencing Edward Bulger to leave the State of California, never to return under the penalty of death.

A sub-Committee was appointed to read to the prisoner the sentence passed upon him; also to other prisoners whose banishment had been ordered.

As Bulger was laboring under the effect of intense nervous excitement and debility, the sub-Committee concluded to defer the reading of his sentence until just previous to his removal from the cell.

It now appears from the testimony of the sub-Committee, that in the confusion which arose on the departure of the prisoner from the building, the reading of the sentence was omitted.

It also appears from the statement of Capt. Smith, of the bark Yankee, that the application of Bulger for passage back to this port, was the expression to him of his (Bulger's) desire to return to the Committee, to obtain from them their permission to proceed to New York.

Under these circumstances, the Committee of Vigilance deem it a duty to remit the sentence of death passed upon Bulger, for his return to this State. At the same time, it is deemed proper to state that all other prisoners shipped hence, having had their sentence read to them, in case of their return will suffer the penalty of death. By order of the Executive Committee, 33, Secretary.

P. S. The Steamer is just starting. I have not time to get you the list of the bankruptcies. Yours, most faithfully,

Hard Facts.

Another Letter from San Francisco.

San Francisco, August 3, 1856.

To Thomas F. Meagher, Esq., Editor of the Irish News.

Sir—In one of your July issues you have inserted several communications from Californian correspondents, in which they have charged all the persons expatriated by the Vigilance Committee of this city as being, without exception, persons of bad character, such as ballot-box stuffers, shoulder-hitters, &c. Now, sir, I will assume the responsibility of saying that the author or authors of those communications knew at the time of penning them that they were false, and were actuated either by personal malice and jealousy, or were purchased by the gold or the promises of a band of traitors to scribble their vile slanders—a band of traitors, who have in numerous cases trampled upon the constitution they have either sworn to support, or are bound by every patriotic motive to respect, to venerate and to protect. Sir, the only real crime (God save the word) they have committed in the eyes of a Vigilance Committee, and in the eyes of four-fifths of this community, was that of being too much opposed to the action of the committee, and too strongly in favor of Democratic principles, those principles which brought you, sir, under the ban of the British Government, which in its futile attempt to destroy your reputation for and power to enkindle and spread the sacred flame of liberty, has built up for you a character and fame lofty as the mountains and swelling streams of happy and free America.

Yours, respectfully,

Robert D. Reen.

From the Wexford Independent we take the following letter and the comments suggested by it:

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEPENDENT.

Kilrush, August 1st, 1856.

Dear Sir:—Will you be kind enough to insert the accompanying sketch in your truly independent print, of a delightful scene which I had the pleasure to witness on Wednesday evening last, at Clobemon Hall, the seat of Mrs. DeRinzy; the cause of which I am sure you, sir, as well as very many of the numerous readers of the Independent, will rejoice in. With great respect, I am, dear sir, your's very truly,

Moses Nolan.

"As I was passing by Clobemon Hall, on Wednesday evening last, I heard the shouts of merriment, and at intervals the sounds of music of no ordinary character, which attracted me to a scene of joyous festivity, when I inquired the cause of what I saw and heard, and was answered that young Mathew DeRinzy, the heir to the Clobemon estates, who had emigrated, about four years back, to Australia, and who was believed to be dead, was alive and well, and that Mrs. DeRinzy, in consequence, had invited all her tenantry to a splendid entertainment to celebrate the joyful tidings. About one hundred and fifty sat down to dinner, after which the merry pipes struck up, and the lads and lasses tripped it on the light fantastic toe, such as Erin's children alone can do. The Kilrush Chapel band attended, and played several national airs in a manner rarely surpassed. Bonfires and pitch barrels blazed in several parts of the country, sending up their spiral columns of light in token of the welcome and joyous intelligence. The sports continued till early dawn, and before separating there were three cheers given for Mrs. DeRinzy and the young heir of Clobemon, three for the Rev. Dr. Devereux, and three for the Rev. Mr. Fanning and the Kilrush Band. M. N."

The above simple narrative will be read throughout the length and breadth of this country with sentiments of the liveliest satisfaction by all who knew and esteemed the late Mathew DeRinzy—and their name is legion—or who can appreciate the feelings of a tender-hearted and affectionate mother on recovering a long-lost child. Letters reached this country twelve months back which threw the family into the deepest affliction, as they left no doubt that the young Mr. DeRinzy had fallen a victim to the fever epidemic of the colony, and the fact of no letter being received from the young gentleman himself added a fearful corroboration to the impression. The miscarriage of his letters is owing to the irregularities of the inland posts, and the great distance at which he resides from the seaboard, being 500 miles north of Melbourne. When he last wrote he was in the enjoyment of health, spirits, and prosperity, being largely engaged in agricultural operations. And it is to be hoped that, ere long, he will revisit his patrimonial estate at home, and bring fresh joy and happiness to his beloved parent and an attached family circle.

Correspondence.

DUBLIN LETTER.

Dublin, August 16th, 1856.

I was on the point of giving you an account of my trip down to Clongowes, on the 31st of last month, in the letter I last sent you, when something or other called me away, and I had to seal up.

It was the Academy Day. Every old Clongownian knows what that means. Those who have never been to Clongowes will understand that it means the last day of the Academical year. The students pull off their corduroy trowsers, jump into genteel costume, and after a brilliant display of eloquent fireworks, turn the key in their trunks and go home. In a word, it corresponds with the Commencement Day of your American Colleges.

The morning was the sweetest of mornings. The soft brightness of it; the lisping of the little breeze; the rich scent of the meadow-lands along the clear brown Liffey; the leaping of the trout as the sun, here and there, turned to diamonds the bubbles of the river; the Devil's Mill upon its bank close to Lucan; the tidy small inn of that pretty small village; Celbridge, with the ivied gables of the abbey sacred to the memories of Swift and Grattan; Sheehan's hotel; the old woollen factory, gutted of its machinery; Rathcoffey house, away to the right, looking out over the tops of the Scotch fir and the dense crowd of its sheltering oak and beech-trees; the ruined Norman castle on the old avenue, midway between the Dublin road and the College the dirty village of Clane; Butterhill, with its carpet of buttercups and honeysuckles; the sparkling, gurgling brown streams, famous for craw-fish and pinkeens, trickling under the road through arches covered with weeds and briers, and rushing off through green marshes, shrubberies, broken water-courses, or broad patches of furze and coshier; the grand new entrance, with its graceful tower, portcullis, curtain-walls and turrets; the spacious avenue, with its double row of beech and chestnut; everything was charming. I drove down, and took my time on the road. For a few miles, through a beautiful country, with a couple of pleasant companions, there's nothing like the outside car. The rest of the invited guests (the Dublin contingent at-all-events) went by railway to Sallins. From Sallins they had shan-dra-dans to the college, a distance of three miles.

The features of the day were just the same as they used to be in your time. The Jesuits are inflexible. Time writes no wrinkle on their azure brow. Death, appears to me, to have little to do with them. This last visit of mine convinces me of that. I found very few gaps in the Kildare detachment of the army of Loyola.

John Pexton, the Shoemaker of the establishment, still thrives like an ash sapling, and blossoms like a sprig of pink hawthorn, though it is more than twelve years ago that a weakness in the legs painfully excited his customers and friends. At the best of times, they were no great specimens of bone and muscle. The white cotton stockings and coarse black velveteen knee-breeches he wore, showed off conspicuously their timidity and scantiness. It would have been well for John had his lower extremities been gifted with the stability of the legs of his stool. John, however, still sticks to his last. His demure nose still blushes and blooms—like that sprig of pink hawthorn—though the winter of life has partially whitened his thatch.

Phil Rielly is still to the good. In his decorous black suit, white cravat and crispy gray hair, he walks the corridors of Clongowes to th s day—attends the sanctuary and sacristy of the college chapel—carries his parchment-bound volume of Italy ian meditations—mildly discourses on worldly affairs—dispenses pills and salts to sick boys in the Infirmary—and doing other good works, descends complacently, letting off hydrogen, into the valley of death.

Mick Gallagher, who in your Clongownian Collegiate career had care of the dormitory—swept out the feathers and dust—sprinkled the floor with hyssop and tea-leaves—and made up the beds—even Mick, surviving these Augean labors of thirty years and upwards, flourishes well Like Pexton's, his delicate shanks have been deprived of their primitive suppleness long since. Like Pexton's, however, Gallagher's thigh and shin-bone remain true to their mission. Whatever other fate may befal him—wherever he may be buried—in the fond memories of all old Clongownians, an ambrosial odor will cling to Mick Gallagher, the Groom of the Bed-Chamber! Mick, I remember, was remarkable for the size and length of his beads. On a winter's morning, in a dim corner at the end of the Chapel—the lamps burning phlegmatically and clouding its own light in fog—Mick, in his rough brown over-coat and bone buttons, kept up the quietest clatter possible with those favorite beads. A pious harmless, guileless poor soul—a comical anatomy in soiled linen—his honest devotion, even in the most solemn hours, on the most sacred spot, excited a smile.

The more generous bulk of John Mulligan, the tailor and out fitter, contains a vitality no less active than that which sustains his less corpulent brothers in the discharge of their duties. John is as round, sudorific, radiant, oleaginous as ever. Even to this day—though the leaves and the wallnuts in the Academic groves have many times fallen—though he has measured and fitted several generations—he retains something more than the warmth of his professional goose when on service. Even to this day—though thrones have blown up or crumbled into dust in the wide world about him—John throws one fat leg before the other, or crosses them comfortably under him, enlightening posterity with the flashes of his needle. May the scissors of the Parcæ long spare his threads!

So much for the lay-brothers. Enough, at-any-rate, I should say, for a letter destined for American readers, considering that such mere "personal recollections" can interest them but little, and that the Presidential Campaign, now pending, absorbs them completely. I have, however, such scanty materials to work on when shaping a letter to you, that once I hit on a new incident or scene—any thing at-all out of the common run—out of the tame, flat, hackneyed road of ordinary occurrences—deaths, births, marriages, and accidents—I make the most of it. I pick the rare fish clean to the gills and backbone. I drain the choice bottle—the particularly choice bottle—to the rim of the bell. And such has been this visit of mine to Clongowes.

Dublin is dull. Dublin is sober—as sober as a drab gaiter, yet just as genteel. Dublin, like Venice in her faded garments of beauty, has fallen to sleep in the shadow of her domes and columns, and dimly dreams, if she even dreams, of the days of her revels, her senate and nobility—the days when she sat, not as a simpering menial, but as a proud Queen, among the civic-crowned sisterhood of Europe, and could lift her banner of the three Castles and the Wolf-Dog, as Jean of Orleans lifted her black banner, sown with silver lilies, against the enemy at her gates.

Dublin, I say, is dull, motionless, colorless, if not dead. Having nothing there to write about, and driven to desperation by the sterility (in the news line) which there prevails, I seize upon this trip to Clongowes with fierce avidity, and like a hungry hawk, pluck and strip it to the bone.

The Jesuits are the same the world over. The same in every generation Their features never change. The spirit and system of their colleges, throughout all climates and vicissitudes, immutably prevail. As it is in Lancashire, so it is in Louisiana. As it is upon the gentle Liffey, so it is upon the monster Mississippi. Whether it be Ghent or Clane, Calcutta or Tullamore, the unity of the Order is complete and permanent. The essentials do not change. Neither do the externals. There's not been a brick, nor a slate, nor a stick, nor a cobweb in or about Clongowes touched, for better or worse, since you passed out of it last.

The Latin inscription over the doorway was there, deeply cut in the blueish mottled gray stone—as deeply cut as ever it was. That's not to be wondered at. Then there was the old Quaker-like clock—with its broad white face, and long sprawling fingers, and drab-colored plain wooden frame, snugly set in the drab-colored wall, facing the door-way — leisurely ticking, looking quite cold, and showing the cold shoulder to every one who came in. The stone stair-case up to the Round-Room, was as powdery and white (with whitewash and pumice-stone) as it was when Tom Wade (the lay-brother from Cork) had care of it, years ago. Of the Museum, the Library, the Reception Room, the Sodality Chapel—the whole of the main building—Castle-Browne proper—the same may be said. On the panels of some of the doors, the autographs of ambitious youths—left there forcibly with tenpenny nails or penknives twenty, thirty years back—despite several coatings of paint, are still clearly decipherable. Two I especially noticed. Maurice O'Connell was the one.—Francis Stack Murphy was the other. The one is dead. The other obscurely perishes. The genius and heart of both, properly directed, would have prolonged their lives and given them a celebrity to endure for many and many years to come. As it is, perhaps that door-panel, opening into a narrow closet in the quietest part of that quiet college of Clongowes, may preserve their names long after their tombstones have been submerged by the calm though remorseless ocean of Time, and the moth has eaten all mention of them from the family prayer-book and the rolls of Parliament.

Going down the stairs and passage connecting the old with the new building, (old and new are used comparatively), I found the heavy copper bell, with which we used to be called to studies and other duties, or rung out to foot-ball, holding on tightly with its short arms to the whitewashed scaffolding, in the corner of the corridor—the "gallery" they call it—into which you step from the refectory. I'll write an epic—I should say an elegy—on that bell before many weeks go by. It has seen a world of trouble, and been the cause of it, and told it to the dumb stones about it and above it, with a dry tongue that never faltered. Brightly green with verdigris to-day, without a crack or bruise, it does its duty just as briskly as it ever did. There's a spider's web—a dusty blanket, thick-set with the crisped wings and carcases (reduced to cinders) of heaps of flies—in the angle of the walls, close under the ceiling, above the bell. Thus, it is evident, the spiders enjoy long leases where the Jesuits are landlords and own the tenement. The spiders are undisturbed. They weave, and catch their fragile prey, without any fear of their neutrality being violated. Thus the dumb creation shares the steadiness, immobility and composure of the intrepid Order within whose walls and groves they crawl for shelter. For better or for worse, there's not the smallest change in Clongowes.

O'Connell used to say—"The day I left my son Dan at Clongowes, there was a speck of dirt upon his left cheek, a little below his ear. I called to see him eight months after—the speck of dirt had not been touched."

This anecdote I had from one of the Jesuits themselves—Father Michael Bellew, third son of the late Sir Michael Dillon Bellew, Bart., Co. Galway, and I give it to you in further evidence of the indisposition to innovate which so rigidly characterizes the good Jesuits at home and abroad.

The next mail will bring you the other and better half of this letter. Your old schoolfellow, KILMAINHAM.

PARAGRAPHS FROM THE DUBLIN PAPERS.

Christopher Fitzsimon, O'Connell's son-in-law, is dead. He died the 25th of last month, in Macerata, near Rome. His death leaves the Clerkship of the Irish Haniper office vacant. It's a comfortable berth. Some respectable Whig, like Fitzsimon, will be sure to walk into it. Beyond his filial relationship to the great Daniel of Derrynane, there was nothing remarkable about the deceased Christopher. The only thing we recollect of him just now, was a speech of his in the Court-house, Kilmainham, in the month of July, 1849, at a meeting called by the High Sheriff, young Shaw, (Sir Frederick's son,) to make preparations for the Queen's visit to Ireland. Fitzsimon read a letter, written by O'Connell to him, apropos to Prince Albert's marriage with the Queen, an event then on the tapis. Old Dan, in the most courtly diction spoke of the Prince, said he was decidedly handsome, and recommended him, through Fizsimon (Lord! what an introduction) to the good graces and favors of the Irish at-home. Christopher Fitzsimon leaves representatives of his virtues and intellect behind him in patriots like Pat Costello, John Hyacinth Talbot, Sir Timothy O'Brien, Tom Arkins, (tailor to the Liberator and Hierarchy of Ireland,) and William Gernon, the newly-appointed Secretary of Charitable Bequests.

Charles Gavan Duffy has been addressing his Australian constituents at Warrnambool, the province of Port Philip or Victoria. He seems just as much at home among the sheep-owners, shepherds, miners and merchants of the South Pacific regions, as he used to do in the Confederate Council-room, D'Olier street, Dublin, or the Tenant League, wherever that hopeful delusion met. The Australian press fill up their columns with learned comments on his Warrnambool oration. Some of the articles, referring to him, are cold and somewhat severe. Most are flattering. All are respectful.

The Melbourne Age, in a delightful tone, informs us that "Mr. Duffy, has, at length, unfolded his programme. He has gone down to the Western District as a candidate for the united counties of Villiers and Heytesbury; and his first address to the electors will be found in another column of its morning issue.

Mr. Duffy jumps at once in medea res. There is no beating about the bush with him. He tells the country plainly what he means to do. His manifesto is an open declaration of war against the existing government. He describes what is thought of it in Europe and America. For imbecility and extravagance it has become a bye-word among the nations of the earth.

In Mr. Duffy's speech we see how our political condition strikes a stranger. We are so accustomed to see and hear of the incapacity and corruption of the government that we are surprised at nothing. Both in regard to the corporation and the government, we may say 'that from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot there is no soundness in them, but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores.' In reality they stink in the nostrils of the people; but, as in the case of other nuisances of a physical nature, we are so accustomed to them that what was once a source of disgust becomes an object of admiration. Mr. Duffy's vision is not yet beclouded with dust; and it will prove of no small advantage to us that he is bringing his clear and vigorous faculties to bear upon that he sees around him."

The Age is one of the reforming journals. What the Nation in Davis' day was to Ireland, the Age is to Australia. It is thoroughly national. It spurns all littleness or provincialism. Generous and lofty in its spirit, it inspires that great new country with ideas which, one of these days, must surely realize themselves in republican institutions, and a history not inferior to that of these glorious United States.

The Argus, however, is an English government paper. A Tory paper. A British official paper of the blackest ink. It is to Melbourne, and the country of the Golden Fleece, of which that young handsome city is the capital, what the Evening Post, (old Fred Conway's paper) was to Dublin, and the rest of Ireland. It's the government boot-black. It keeps the imported leather polished. That's its respectable business.

Of Mr. Duffy and his Warrnambool speech, this one-eyed Argus writes—

"We must confess that Mr. Duffy's speech at Warrnambool pleases us less than any he has yet been reported to have made in Australia. He may be right in denouncing the past extravagance and mismanagement of the government, and in ascribing to these much loss to our reputation both in Europe and America, but in the language he uses upon this subject there is more of the demagogue stump-orator style than we have previously detected in him since his arrival. There are in this country few social barriers to prevent his genius from having full scope, or partially to justify him in exciting a people that he is not permitted to guide. Here he has ample opportunity to do his best, both as to word and action, and he should avoid all clap-trap art, all pandering to that too prevalent taste which relishes keen sarcasm and brilliantly-expressed censure, more than justly-balanced observation and discriminating criticism."

The Sydney papers follow suit. Some in praise, others in reproof. On the whole, Mr. Duffy appears to have made a decided hit in emigrating to Australia. For him, in every respect, it's a fortunate exile. It was well for him he became disgusted with Irish politics, and flew before the Cape Pigeon and Albatross to the land of the Kangaroo and Platabus. Australia will surely be a Republic before long, and Duffy will be a candidate for the Presidency. In that case, we know a distinguished gentleman who will apply for the embassy to Sydney.

Congratulatory addresses to Smith O'Brien, are pouring in from all quarters, through the post-bag of Dromoland. A very beautiful one, emanating from the united parishes of Newmarket, Wells and Carrigera, appears in most of the Irish papers just come to hand. These few words from the noble fellow's reply to this address we cannot resist quoting:

"The pleasure I have felt has been excited in a high degree whilst I have visited the scenes in which my boyhood was passed—scenes of which every spot is familiar to me—scenes in which I have been welcomed with kindling or tearful eyes, by the aged who have known me since my infancy, and by their children who have been taught to consider me as a friend and a brother.

The influence of these associations is apart from all considerations of a political kind: but I venture to hope that it is enhanced by one sentiment which is common to all whose esteem I prize—that of deep attachment to our beloved fatherland.

To promote the universality of this sentiment will be the chief object of my future efforts, and I shall not regret that I have been called upon to endure suffering for Ireland, if by such suffering I be enabled to apply myself to this task with augmented success."

MacManus' letter to the Vigilance Committee of San Francisco, appears in the Nation. It's an admirable letter. It deserves to be set up in type in every direction.

Catherine Hayes has arrived at Liverpool. She returns to Ireland with a mountain of gold. If among the Sand-hills of San Francisco, the Australian Alps and forests, the temples and bazaar's of India, she has left many a delicious and noble note, which, long echoing, will perpetuate her name among the people of those climes and cities, she has taken away with her from out of them that which will make her Irish home a home of light, luxury and splendor. On Monday, the 9th of February, 1846, Smith O'Brien speaking in Conciliation Hall of Irish gentlemen of fortune and high social station patronizing foreign artistes, and spending their money in foreign capitals, instead of encouraging Irish genius and giving their own country the benefit of their wealth, said:—

"I find Irish gentlemen going to Dresden, Florence and Munich, in order to gratify their taste for the fine arts. Irish gentlemen go to Milan for the purpose of hearing the Opera, and what do they find there? They find an Irish lady the prima donna of the Opera at Milan—a countrywoman of my own—(said O'Brien,)—Miss Hayes—Signora Catarina Hayes—a Limerick lady."

Reading from time to time of the triumphs of Catherine Hayes, in the newest regions of the New World—in the beautiful and opulent cities of the Pacific, and among the sumptuous marts and palaces of India—those words of O'Brien never failed to strike us. He, himself, must feel happy, that, at a time when she was little known, he spoke so proudly of her. On the eve of her leaving Melbourne, she presented nearly $3,000 to the Melbourne Hospital. The Managing Committee of the Hospital acknowledging the queenly donation, expressed their gratitude in these words:—

"With a view of perpetuating the remembrance of your gift, we have placed to the credit of the fund now forming for the completion of the Hospital Building by the erection of a right wing, in which a ward to be called the Catherine Hayes Ward, will be especially devoted to the use of persons suffering from pulmonary disease. We fervently pray for your health and happiness, and that you may reach your native land in peace and plenty."

John Rea, the Belfast Attorney, is roaring as strenuously a ever. His last roar has been let off at the Petty Sessions of Moira. Several parties were charged with violently assaulting he Rev. Father McKay, of Magherlin, on the 15th of July last. Ray defended the rioters—or rather, he confessed their guilt, and having pronounced a glowing eulogium on Father McKay, effected a compromise between the defendants and plaintiff. Father McKay declined to press for punishment. "No conclusion," Mr. Rea observed, "could have been more advantageous to the country." From the Belfast Mercury we learn, that the court "then emptied, and the people, after giving three cheers for the priest, quietly separated." John Rea is amassing coins. His professional life, though thickly set with thistles and other rough nuisances, is pretty well supplied with golden grain. In a word, Rea is very industrious and noisy, very eccentric and honest, an impetuous voluble man, with hot brains and red eyes.

Lord Castlerosse has been returned for Kerry. Having been appointed Comptroller of the Queen's Household, he had to vacate his seat, and go through the ceremony of a fresh nomination in the Court-house of Tralee. A Whig parish-priest, the Very Rev. Dean McEnery, proposed the young lord. James O'Connell (Dan's brother) seconded the nomination. On this occasion, he was not James the Less, but James the Great. His speech was a wonderful effort for a man of his sterility of soul. Lord Castlerosse delivered himself of a highly respectable speech. He praised Lord Palmerston to the skies, and congratulated Ireland on having given birth to so splendid a statesman. In conclusion, he said—

When her Majesty was graciously pleased to appoint me to the office I have the honor to hold, I accepted it under the impression that I should fully meet your approbation in so doing.

This sentiment was greeted with long-continued applause. So my Lord Castlerosse goes back to London, to superintend the Queen's pantry and laundry, with a certificate from Father McEnery, and all the independent Repealers of Kerry.

The Nation, alluding to the transaction, has the following—

This week a young Catholic nobleman is elected for the county of Kerry. He is an excellent young man, religious, modest, liberal, the son of a father nobler by nature than by name. But what foreigner of any land, where a fine public spirit was cultivated, as essential to the character of a Catholic gentleman, would believe, that it is especially as the official of Lord Palmerston, this young noble is accepted and re-elected by an Irish Catholic constituency! Such is the position to which paltering with public faith, and endorsing false oaths, has gradually reduced the moral sense of the Catholics of Ireland.

But whilst the Catholics of Kerry thus (in the eyes of the Nation) pocket the insults of Lord Palmerston, and by the return of one of his salaried young sycophants compromise the dignity of their religion, Gallagher, the Ventriloquist, sends £16 to the new church of Ballinasloe. Father John Kirwan, in acknowledging the gift of the zealous Ventriloquist, begs the prayers of Ballinasloe "for his spiritual and temporal welfare." These are the richest crumbs we have been able to pick out of the Dublin sixpenny loaf—the best baked in the city.

IRISH REGIMENTS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE.

The 87th Regiment.

It is not generally known that this regiment owes its origin to a wager between the Prince Regent and the lateDuchess of Gordon in September, 1793, as to whether an Irish or a Scotch regiment could be sooner embodied, the regiment whose establishment should be first completed, to have the seniority in the army. Letters of Service were accordingly issued to Major John Doyle and the Duke of Gordon, authorising each to raise a regiment of his own countrymen, and the result was in favor of the Irish corps, which was actually in service against the enemy in Flanders in a week after the Gordon Highlanders (now the 92d Regiment) was embodied at Aberdeen. In point of fact, the Royal Irish Fusileers ought to be the 81st Regiment, as it was embodied prior to the embodiment of the regiment now numbered the "Eighty-first." It is, however, now too late to remedy this error as to the seniority of the two corps. The 87th Regiment was raised in September, 1793, by the late General Sir John Doyle, Baronet, a Kilkenny man, who died Colonel of the regiment, August 8, 1834, in London. The first man who joined the regiment was also a Kilkenny man, named Wm. Croker O'Grady, who was apprenticed to a tradesman in College-Green, Dublin, at whose house Sir John Doyle was lodging, while endeavoring to procure recruits for this regiment, which was to consist of eight companies of light infantry, and two troops of cavalry, being destined for the West Indies, where all the native regiments were then similarly constituted. Mr. O'Grady died at Woodbridge, Suffolk, April 27, 1855, a Quartermaster on retired full pay of the 12th Regiment. Two of his brothers held commissions in the 87th Regiment, and died of wounds received in the Peninsular war. The 87th proceeded to the West Indies in October, 1796, and was stationed in all the unhealthy islands, viz., Trinidad, St. Christopher's, St. Lucia, Martinique, Dominica, Curacoa, with a stay of only four months at Barbadoes. The Regiment embarked at St. Christopher's for England in July 1804, having lost, from the West Indian climate, several officers and seven hundred and ninety men in eight years! It returned to England in July 1804, and proceeded in September 1806 to South America, and suffered severely during the war in that country; it embarked in August 1807 for the Cape of Good Hope, and was sent thence in October 1810 to the capture of Mauritius, where it remained until June 1815, when it embarked for Calcutta, and served in India until February 1827, having been engaged in the first Burmese war, and several other affairs against the Mahrattas. The regiment sailed for England in February 1827, and was sent to Ireland in September 1830. It proceeded to Newry, where it only remained two months, in consequence of some of the men having refused to proceed to chapel unless the band should precede the regiment. In consequence of this disturbance the regiment was sent to Plymouth, and was placed under orders for the West Indies, whither, however, it was not sent, but embarked in March 1831 for the Mauritius for twelve years, and landed in England in September 1843. The regiment was not allowed to land in Ireland during its last tour of home service, and embarked for Calcutta in April 1849, having thus served in its native country only two months since the corps was embodied sixty-three years since; and having served exclusively on the worst foreign stations, with the exception of the time passed at the Mauritius, which colony, though not generally unhealthy, suffers equally with India from tropical heat and fever. The late Second Battalion of the 87th Regiment was highly distinguished during the Peninsular war; it was embodied in December, 1804, and served in Ireland from March 1805, to October 1806; proceeded in February 1809, to Portugal, and did not return home until July 1814, when it landed at the Cove of Cork. It was, of course, not allowed to remain in Ireland, and embarked on the 23d of August following for Portsmouth, where it did not arrive until the 14th of September, owing to the miserable transports employed for its removal to England, where it was disbanded in February 1817, having served but twenty-one months in its native country.

From the Dublin Evening Mail.

THE IRISH MILITIA AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

We beg leave to assure Lord Panmure that there is not much truth in the statement which he made in the House of Lords that "such of the Irish militia as had returned home were perfectly content with the terms they had received." The noble Lord is not personally answerable for this extraordinary assertion, inasmuch as he quotes the chief secretary to the Lord Lieutenant as his authority; but the fact is a false fact. The Irish militia are perfectly discontented with the treatment they have received, and they have a right to be so; for they have been used most scurvily and unjustly. As to the acknowledgement by the noble Secretary for War of the "admirable behavior" of that ill-used force, small thanks are due to him or to his colleagues for that. They did their best to goad the Irish militia to acts of mutiny and violence, and if they succeeded in one instance, to them be ascribed their due shares of the censures and disgraces. The militia of Ireland, from the highest in command to the private soldier, repudiate the fulsome and interested eulogies of Lord Panmure. They value not his approbation, nor would deprecate any ill word he might find in his nature to bestow upon them. But they well appreciate the testimony borne to their character and conduct by the Earl of Ellenborough, who in the same debate, declared that "the Irish militia was, without doubt, incomparably the most valuable militia force which we had;" and verified that favorable testimony by undeniable proofs. "It appeared," said the noble Earl, "that while the desertions from the English militia were 23 1-2 per cent., and from the Scotch 20 per cent., those from the Irish militia were only 5 per cent.; and it appears also that the enlistment to the regular army from the English militia was 7 1-2 per cent., from the Scotch militia 14 1-2, and from the Irish militia 21 per cent." This, indeed, is praise acceptable not only to our militia, but such as our country generally may receive, as a tribute to the military character and services of her sons. The proportion in which volunteering took place out of the militia into the fighting regiments of the Crimea gives the trust and true measure of the relative obligations of the State to the several parts of the United Kingdom. By that calculation Ireland appears to have stood by the Queen in her hour of need with thrice the ardor and fidelity manifested by Great Britain. The fact is proved both negatively and positively; first in the trusty adherence of our men to their colors after joining the service, and then in their superior alacrity to go out and meet the foe. Lord Panmure and his colleagues will not deny this, because they cannot; but virtus laudator et alget. Not the slightest distinctive mark of approbation has been offered to her Majesty's Irish troops from the first day that Lord Raglan assumed the command in the East to the present moment. A virtual acknowledgement, indeed, was made of Irish prowess by ministers soliciting, and almost supplicating, our constabulary force to join the Guards. Their refusal, indeed, to merge their national name in that favored organization, is probably among the causes why the services of their countrymen have been so invidiously, if not resentfully, slighted. Not a single regimental distinction has been bestowed upon any Irish corps that served so gallantly in that struggle. We have seen the guards feted and glorified till they seemed to believe that they had stood alone on the heights of the Alma, and single-handed driven back the Russian columns across the Inkermann. We have seen the the Highland Brigade lauded according to its merits, not above them certainly, but with a liberal and fair appreciation. We have seen a third battalion added, honoris causa, to the Saxon files of the Rifle Brigade; but although the Irish soldiery are proved to have pressed forward voluntarily into the "imminent deadly breach," with three-fold impetuosity; although they have refused, in the same proportion, to flinch from their colors at home; although, in the field, their names and their peculiar method of attack soon made them conspicuous, and gave them a high place in the estimation of the enemy, their name—as Irishmen—has never once been mentioned by Queen, Lords or Commons. It is tabooed in General Orders. No second battalion has been given to the Royal Irish, who were the first and only corps that entered Sebastopol, whilst the Russian garrison had possession of it; nor to the Connaught Rangers, who during the whole of those fierce encounters, from the Alma to the Redan, were never once missing from the foremost post of danger, nor found wanting there. Even the petty honors of the Light Infantry Regiment are denied to any corps. We must sink all our associations of race and soil in the generic title of Britons; at the same time that we have distinctive privileges and decorations showered upon those who can rightly claim that name, whether North or South.

Irish News.

From the Cork Reporter we learn that a meeting is to be held in Clonakilty, for the purpose of renewing the war against the Church Establishment—its temporalities, not its religion. We hail, says the Reporter, any authoritative expression of public opinion on the question with interest and satisfaction. We are also glad to see the matter taken up by any locality, in the hope of its example being followed; for it is scarcely possible that real good can be effected in Parliament so long as Ireland retains its aspect of indifference and exhibits an appearance of utter apathy. Most Protestants in England and many in Ireland are of opinion that Maynooth should be disendowed. If this be their opinion, and such it clearly is, they ought not be surprised if Irish Catholics are even more strongly of opinion that the Church Establishment should no longer rest on their backs. Irish Catholics, though much less able to bear burdens than their more fortunately circumstanced Protestant countrymen, are willing to support their own church; and they hold the opinion that true religion is served, not injured, by its ministers depending upon the attachment and liberality of their flocks for their support.

Writing about the Killaloe Regatta, the Limerick Observer says:—The bill of fare for the occasion promises a rich treat of pleasure and amusement to all those who may seek relaxation from business for two days; and Mr. Jeremiah M'Carthy has placed the "Non-Such" at the service of the public. The Observer trusts that her services will be largely availed of, particularly by those who have never yet visited ancient and venerable Killaloe.

The Galway Vindicator informs us that Mr. Smith O'Brien drove through Galway, a few days ago, in the carriage of Mr. Barton, of Salthill, in company with that gentleman. Though exhibiting the appearance of physical suffering, the Vindicator is glad to perceive that he still retains vigor and energy. He was warmly greeted by old friends.

A very gratifying and very deserved compliment has been paid to the Rev. Edward M'Bride, by his friends of Londonderry, on the occasion of his departure from that town to assume the pastoral care of the parish of Urney. It consisted in the presentation of a testimonial of the respect and love which the Catholics of Derry entertain for this estimable clergyman.

The fee simple Carolstown Estate, County Meath, containing 569 statute acres of arable meadow and pasture, has been put for sale at Messrs. Littledale's auction rooms, 9 Upper Ormond Quay, Dublin. Mr. Patrick Sherlock became the owner for £10,250. The estate lies in a ring fence, within two miles of Trim, and was recently valued at £455 per annum.

At the examinations held last month, in the Queen's College, Belfast, Mr. John Heath, son of Mr. William Heath, Arklow, obtained first place in Natural History and a reward of twenty-five shillings worth of books. Mr. Heath matriculated in October last from the University Civil and Military Institution, 26 Kildare street, Dublin, having been prepared in his matriculative examination by the principal, William Stapleton, T.C.D.

From the Cork Examiner we give the following dialogue and scene:—Constable Edwards brought up two parties named Rd. Collins and Eliza Maher, the latter a good-looking young woman, on a charge of elopement and suspected robbery.

The Constable stated he had arrested the prisoners as they were about taking their departure in the Bristol boat, on suspicion of being concerned in a robbery which took place in the County Tipperary. On inquiry, he found that the female prisoner had changed a £20 Bank of Ireland note, No. 3,144, J. N., at the establishment of Messrs. Arnott & Co. In answer to his inquiries she stated that she had been given the money by Mrs. Molowney, of Killenaule, in whose service she had been. The male prisoner stated that he was a laborer, and requested the bench to allow them to marry, for he desired to do what was fair. He declared he would wed her "with an inch of a candle." She was not a servant as she stated, but a dress-maker, and obtained the £20 by her needle.

Captain Pollock—You should not have run away.

Collins, to Mr. Besnard—Well, your worship, as you are a clergyman, I hope you will marry us (loud laghter).

Mr. Besnard—It is not the first time I was taken for a clergyman (renewed laghter).

Constable Edwards remarked that the prisoners' clothes were in the same bundle; they seemed to be together in everything.

Collins—Certainly, sir, herself and myself will be together, whatever way the play goes (loud laughter).

The bench ordered the prisoners to be remanded.

Collins inquired how they were to be situated for the night?

Constable Edwards—Together.

Collins—Together, sir, very good (great laughter).

Female Prisoner (bashfully)—Go away.

The prisoners were removed.

Mr. Robert Molesworth, who for some time practised at the Irish Bar previous to emigrating to Australia, has, after several years' successful practice at the Australian Bar, been recently appointed to a puisne judgeship in that colony.

The Northern Whig derives much gratification from observing that the magnificent and powerful screw steam-ship Khersonese, of 2,300 tons, launched at Belfast in October last, by Messrs. Hickson & Co, has been placed on the line between Liverpool, St. John's, Newfoundland, Halifax and Portland.

Several children from Catherine's Court, Waterford, have been out in the fields lately, and whilst there ate heartily of laurel berries, which they found in great profusion. They came home and soon after commenced vomiting. Dr. Ardagh was sent for, who promptly administered emetics. The children recovered.

The members of the Royal Dublin Society, desirous of paying the last tribute of respect to their late venerable Vice-President, Mr. J. Weld, attended his remains to their last resting-place in Mount Jerome Cemetery. The Cemetery company, unsolicited, allotted for this purpose a portion of the ground reserved for eminent men.

The Hon. Baron Pennefather is at present sojourning at his residence, Knockevan, near Clonmel. The venerable judge is in the enjoyment of excellent health, and daily receives numbers of the gentry who have waited upon him to welcome him again to Tipperary.

Rev. W. Bourke gratefully acknowledges the receipt of £100 per Right Rev. Dr. Ryan, from Mrs. R. Higgins, of Mulgrave street, Limerick, her donation towards the erection of the New Cathedral of St. John's; also, £5 from Matthew Flatherty, Esq., Donameen Castle.

The story runs that, to impress the Limerick lieges with the importance of Viceroyalty, General Sir James Chatterton sent orders to the artillerymen of all the forts within Shannon shot, to salute the steamer carrying his Excellency and suite on the happy day when Scattery beheld him circumnavigating her monastic shores. The order was executed with admired effect, especially at Tarbert. Gunpowder was consumed in considerable quantities. The expenditure figured in the monthly return from the Shannon Forts, and the deficit was expected to go freely into the great imperial ledger as a cheap attestation of the Vice-regal popularity. A little to the surprise of the "returning officer" of gunpowder and other stores, a despatch was received by the aforesaid officer, asking by whose authority the expenditure was caused, and requiring an answer, as per margin, by return of post. The answer was inevitable—by the authority of General Sir James Chatterton. What was the astonishment, however, of the returning officer, when as reported, another official document arrived, informing him that General Sir James had no authority to order salvoes for the Earl of Carlisle from the Shannon Forts, and advising that a bill for seven pounds sterling British money, not pounds weight of gunpowder, should be sent in to the General, with a request for payment in British current coin.

Dr. Murphy, coroner, has held an inquest at Boherbuoy, on the body of William Foynes, late sergeant in the Royal County Limerick Militia. The widow, who is the mother of three young children, was examined. She stated that her husband was originally a railway policeman, stationed at Clonmel; that he had enlisted in the 60th Rifles, after serving five years in which his mother bought him out for £20. He then joined the militia, in which he was made a sergeant at once, from his capacity for drilling the men, and he expected some higher promotion for his services in that way. He was very sober and temperate. On his discharge he complained several times of his disappointment in not being retained on the permanent staff. Of a sudden he took a fit, and in about five minutes expired in her arms. Witness believes he died of a broken heart, from not knowing where to get employment. Dr. Enright, assistant surgeon Limerick County Militia, stated that he knew the deceased, whom he considered a well conducted and temperate man. His death was caused by rupture of one or more of the blood vessels of the head, which produced apoplexy.

A meeting of the Fishery Conservators of the Lower Shannon has been recently held in the County Grand Jury Room, Limerick, Captain Vandeleur in the Chair. It was resolved that the Board should entertain no question with respect to the extension of close time on the Cashen river, until they had before them the evidence taken by the Commissioners of Fisheries at Listowel. On the motion of Major Dunne, seconded by Mr. Molony, it was agreed that proceedings by indictment should in future be instituted against owners of fixed engines against whom two convictions might be had for breaches of the weekly close time. A variety of matters in connexion with the fishery were discussed with great warmth.

A letter has been received by the Mayor of Clonmel, in which it is stated that the highest military authority in England has expressed himself favorable to the project of making Clonmel a military district. The Mayor of Clonmel, the Earl of Donoughmore, Mr. Bianconi, Mr. Bigwell, Mr. Stephen Moore and other gentlemen of influence are now making great efforts to induce the government to make that town a military district. The Duke of Cambridge has written to the Mayor, stating that the memorial on the subject which has been forwarded from the Corporation will be favorably taken into consideration by the military authorities. Lord Panmure, also by letter, has expressed himself in terms nearly similar to those of the Duke of Cambridge, and, on the whole, the inhabitants of Clonmel are full of hopes that their expectations on the matter will not be disappointed.

The indefatigable superintendent of the Waterford and Limerick line, Mr. W. L. Payne, has organized an excursion to London, via Waterford, Milford, and the Great Western Railway, in order to enable the residents of the south of Ireland to see, at a cheap rate, the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. Limerick to London and back again, with an interval of three weeks to look about and enjoy oneself, for 35s., is certainly something new and astonishing in the way of cheapness.

Mentioning the death of Isaac Wild, the Dvblin Evening Packet reminds us that the lamented deceased, through a long life, had been identified with the progress of scientific investigation and the useful arts in his native country. As Honorary Secretary of the Royal Dublin Society, and as its Vice-President, his constant labor and generous efforts for above half a century were highly appreciated in Ireland and known favorably abroad. Mr. Weld was a gentleman of considerable literary taste, and his views of political constitutions, as embodied in a work published by him many years since, attracted considerable attention.

We ascertain from the Limerick papers that a good deal of dissatisfaction is arising amongst the Roman Catholic soldiers in Limerick, in consequence of the discovery that no portion of the new cemetery in the Island is to be consecrated by the Roman Catholic Prelate, for the burial of soldiers belonging to the Catholic faith.

An order was recently given to Mr. Kelly, undertaker, of Blarney lane, Cork, to make a coffin for a young woman named Eliza O'Brien, the daughter of a carpenter residing in Clarence street. The coffin having been made by Mr. Kelly, was sent to the house of Mr. O'Brien, but the man who conveyed it there was directed to take it back, that there was no necessity as yet for it, the young woman for whom it was intended having returned to life. On inquiry he was informed that the young woman, who had been in a bad state of health for some time, became that morning very unwell, and after suffering intensely for a short period apparently expired. After a few hours she exhibited symptoms of returning life. The man brought back the coffin and the young woman rapidly improved.

A collision has taken place on the Belfast Junction line of railway between a down goods train and a ballast engine and wagon which were working on the line at Wellington Inn, about five miles from Newry. The concussion was severe. One man lost his life and three others were seriously injured. The four persons injured by the collision were paid every attention by the officials of the company until medical aid arrived.

After taking legal possession from all the tenants, the reverend gentleman desired them to re-enter their homes again on the same terms as before and same privileges.

We learn from the Cork papers there has been a continuance of heat seldom equalled in that city. On one day in July 1853, the thermometer stood at 80 degs., but the temperature did not continue at a high point for the same length of time it has done within the past few weeks in Cork.

Mr. Piercy, late editor of the Carlow Post, has been promoted to the editorship of the Telegraph.

The Ulsterman has the following: In a case tried recently at the Lurgan Petty Sessions, very remarkable proof was given of the evil effects of undue clemency to public offenders. A number of Orangemen were sent to the last assizes at Armagh, for trial on charge of being concerned in an illegal procession, with drums and fifes, and party flags and emblems. The district from which they were sent had been for some time notoriously disturbed. The crown made light of the affair. The Judge merely bound the offenders over to appear, if again called up, on their own recognisances. When the prisoners were discharged, did they return home peacefully? No, but exultingly. They had an arch of orange lilies erected near the house of a Catholic who had exerted himself conspicuously in putting down these disturbances—they marched past his dwelling in triumph—and made every possible demonstration calculated to show that they had gained a victory over the law. For a long time, the Ulsterman adds, the Orange processionists—the very scum of the population, as Mr. Miller, the stipendiary magistrate, confesses—have kept the neighborhood of Lurgan in a very disturbed state, committing incessant outrages on honest unoffending men—outrages on both persons and property. At last a number of delinquents are brought before the magistrates for their offence, and sent off to the assizes. There the utmost indulgence is shown to their misconduct, and they are discharged with a few meaningless words of warning by a Catholic Judge.

We learn from the Leinster Express that Mr. James Frederick Martley, called to the Irish bar in 1847, eldest son of the late John Martley, Esq., Q. Martley was a member, presented him with a handsome piece of plate, accompanied with an address expressive of their regret and hopes. Distinguished in our university, adds the Express, and having an intimate acquaintance with modern languages and literature, he applied himself diligently to the attainment of an exact knowledge of the various branches of his profession, and bade fair, had he remained in Ireland, to emulate the forensic success of his eminent father, and of his uncles, the Right Hon. Francis Blackburne and Henry Martley, Esq., Q. C.

The Clare Journal says, that since its notice of the discovery of the new sulphur spring at Doora it has became an object of considerable curiosity. Many of the recent visitors of Lisdoonvarna affirm that it is as strong, and possesses all the principal properties of the spring of that famous locality. The water will shortly be submitted to analyzation, and its distinctive properties be made known. The well is now arched in, and care taken to prevent the contact of foreign substances. The situation of the well is on the side of the borheen cut from Doorha chapel across the bog, and was discovered by the strong smell which emanated from it on cutting a trench by the side of the road.

The pike was four feet two inches in length, twenty-six inches in circumference, and forty-three pounds in weight.

A number of trout and other fresh water fish were found dead in the River Barrow, between Mountmelick and Portarlington, three weeks since. In the shallows and near the banks of the river from Garryhinch to Lansdown it is said upwards of 1,000 have been picked up. The cause of such wholesale destruction is attributed to some deleterious fluid being emptied into the river. Some country people who ate of them, were sick for some days. The police have been collecting and burying the fish in barrow-fulls in order to prevent them being used as food.

A laborer named Williams, has been drowned in the Nenagh river. He was a good swimmer, and was amusing himself with diving for money, when it is thought his head must have struck against the bottom and stunned him. Sub-constable Fleming made an effort to save his life, but all to no purpose.

The last Lord Tyrconnell was the celebrated "Dick Talbot," so mercilessly abused by Macaulay, who was created an earl by James II. and was viceroy of Ireland at the revolution.

Thomas Dwyer, a native of Nenagh, in making up hay in Mr. Dillon's stack-yard, at Tyrone, met with a serious accident. He happened to be at the foot of the hayrick, and one of those on the top, happening to let his fork slip down, one of the prongs struck him on the head, which it penetrated so deeply as to cause a severe fracture of the skull. Dwyer was removed to his own home, where he lies in a very painful state.

The Kerry papers intimate that lovers of amusement will find in the intended sports to come off at Killarney this month, a programme such as it is not often their good fortune to witness. Limerick supplies the London market with salmon. The fish leaving Limerick at 4 o'clock in the evening by rail for Waterford reach London, via Milford, for the fish market early next morning. One London house, in the fish trade, paid this season two or three exporters in Limerick upwards of £13,000, for salmon alone. On the whole, the trade in this way is enormous, and the supply appears to be inexhaustible.

Answers to Correspondents.

W. A. M. writes us a very cordial letter, and "respectfully requests" us, now that our Personal Recollections of the Galway election is at end, to publish—in the exact words of "W. A. M."—"Mr. Thomas F. Meagher's speech on the day of his conviction in Ireland, also Mr. John Mitchel's and Mr. Wm. S. O'Brien's." He thinks it would be "cheering to the heart of our afflicted countrymen," &c. &c. We thank W. A. M. for his many compliments, but must refuse to comply with his request, for several reasons, not the least important of which is, that all the speeches alluded to have been recently published in John Savage's "'98 and 48."

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1856.

PUBLIC SALARIES.

Some few of the newspapers have lately expressed dissatisfaction at the recent legislative enactment which raised the pay of members of Congress to $3000 per annum, with the usual allowance for mileage. Discontent has been declared also, in some quarters, at the Bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whereby our Diplomatic and Consular systems are to be regulated, with a somewhat increased scale of remuneration to the officials employed. The objectors, who are in a great minority, probably consist of persons who (for themselves) are not very particular in the articles of dress, food, or lodging.

To men of this class, almost any payment above what would provide the mere necessaries of life, appears extravagant. Such persons, seeing Mr. Dallas and Mr. Mason now set down for $17,500 as Ambassadors to London and Paris, are willing to fill either post for a trifle, and rather than not get the appointment, would accept even $1000 a year. How the work would be done, at the low price, is another thing; nor is it difficult to guess that the low remuneration would probably be made at the expense of national honor and personal probity—for, if compensation were not obtained in one way it would in another.

The writers against the increased pay to members of Congress (which is still very much too low) appeal to "precedent," and declare that, even in England, no member of either House of Parliament receives any payment, simply in his capacity as a legislator. Such is the fact. But what is the result? Independent of what is called the property qualification (which provides that a man must have $3000 a year private property to represent a county, and $1500 to represent a borough), the non-payment virtually prevents any of the middle classes from being a member of Parliament. Not only does the law exclude all but men of property, but the non-payment actually prevents his living in London, where expenses are heavy during the six or eight months of each legislative session. So much has this been felt, that the Chartists have taken as one of their "Five Points" of Reform, the adequate remuneration of Parliament men, which would indeed be only a return to the invariable practice antecedent to the change of system under Cromwell.

In England, the practical effect of non-payment is thus to fill the Lower House with the sons and connections of the nobility and the landed proprietary, instead of, as the very name implies, persons chosen by the Commons or mass of the adult population of the country.

In the United States, inadequate payment has rendered many a legislator liable to the charge of obtaining money or money's worth in barter for his advocacy or opposition to a public measure, or a personal interest. The late, and even the new and augmented rate of payment, is not sufficient to defray the mere expenses of living at Washington—whereas it ought also to compensate a man in some measure for the time devoted to the public service, for the loss of income sustained by inevitable relinquishment of the occupation by which, in his own locality, the legislator obtains a provision for himself and family. It is unjust for a State as well as for an individual, to obtain personal service for nothing.

Give inadequate payment to your private servants, and what must be the issue, in most cases? The servant will pay himself, in some manner. In public life, the parallel holds good. Every now and then a whisper gets abroad that such or such a member of Congress had sterling reasons for this or that vote. For our own part, we wonder that, under the circumstances, such imputations are so rarely made.

England is the best-served country in the world, simply because she gives the most liberal payment to her public men. In many cases she over pays, but even that is better than an unwise economy, which is the dearest in the end. We are by no means enamored of British institutions, but the fact stands boldly out, that England does not lose by liberality. Nor need this country shrink from profiting by the lesson. At present, where high official appointments are not only transitory but so badly paid, that they cannot be held without positive loss to the occupant, none but wealthy persons can afford to hold them. For instance, for many years, the embassy to London has involved an expense so much above the salary, that each occupant has had to draw upon his private fortune. Thus, by an anti-democratic action, all but the rich are virtually excluded from the most honorable and most important offices the State can bestow. We hold to the belief that a poor man with brains, is better qualified for such situations than a rich man without.

To mark the contrast:—under the new bill, our highest payments are $17,500 to the Ambassadors to Great Britain and France; $12,000 to Russia, Spain, Austria, Prussia, Brazil, Mexico, and China; and $10,000 to the ministers sent by the United States to all other countries. There is to be no allowance for outfit, and each minister has to meet the expensive item of house-rent out of this special income.

In England, on the other hand, each Ambassador usually gets a large outfit, is provided with a rent-free first-class residence, and has a liberal allowance for all expenses incurred in obtaining secret information, or facilitating the dispatch of business. Take this as one-fifth to be added to his salary, and the English scale of payment will be—$50,000 to the ambassador to France, $45,000 to Turkey, $36,000 to Russia and Spain, $30,000 to Austria and Prussia, $27,000 to the United States, $25,000 to Sicily, Portugal, and Brazil, and so on, in like proportion, all over the world. Each Ambassador, representing his sovereign, is obliged by his position to expend the whole of his official income, (length of service is provided for by pensions, which we can dispense with), and surely the American Ambassador, representing the Sovereignty of his Nation—far greater than the mere item of Royalty—ought to be allowed the means of doing so, without the pecuniary loss, to which, in most cases, his position subjects him.

The difference between our Consular system and that of England, is just as marked. There are a few prizes in this official lottery, and an immense number of blanks. There is the instance of a highly-gifted man, Mr. Mitchel, (Ik Marvel), sent to Venice, as Consul, without any fixed salary, and compelled to return because he actually lost money, as well as time, by his exile. Under the new act, he would have $750 per annum—or a third of the salary of the English Consul at the same place. Does any one desire to know why American officials in foreign countries are so often neither considered nor treated with the respect due to the great country which they represent? It is because first-class men cannot be had for sixth-rate prices, and because the economy (rather call it the enforced poverty) of our officials stands out in disagreeable but marked contrast with what the liberality of other governments permits, and even encourages their employées to practice. Americans, as individuals, expect their Ambassadors and Consuls to extend the courtesy of hospitality to them—a courtesy generally extended by officials of other nations to their respectable countrymen—but America, as a nation, shabbily withholds the means of doing this. What is worse, this degradation of contracted means, in company with high official standing, is too notorious not to be unpleasantly remarked upon, wherever it exists. Undoubtedly, it weakens the power, by humiliating the position of our representatives in foreign countries. When National economy declines into parsimony, the gain is a loss—as Sheridan's Irishman said, long ago.

It would be easy, following up the difference between the English practice and our own, to show how it is better to err on the side of liberal than parsimonious payment of the national servants. The President, Vice-President, and the seven members of the Cabinet at Washington, receive among them some $89,000, while the Premier, with eight other principal officials, who constitute the British Government, (viz., Lord Chancellor, Chancellor of the Exchequer, four Secretaries of State, and the heads of the India Board and Admiralty), annually receive salaries to the amount of at least $327,500. But, to a great nation, how insignificant is the difference between the large pay in one case, and the comparatively small compensation in the other! Where the population is as large as it is in this country and in England, the small difference between liberal and scanty pay, is not five cents a head on each citizen, while the contrast in the manner in which the work is done shows the "value received" for liberality. In neither country, by the way, can a high official save money out of his salary. The position he holds demands such a large expenditure, that, some years ago, when Lord John Russell was examined before a Parliamentary Committee on Salaries, his evidence concluded with the emphatic declaration that he had never been in debt till he became Prime Minister!

To secure the best men, make it worth their while to devote their integrity, their intelligence, their intellect to the national service. So far from $3000 a year being sufficient for a member of Congress, it is far below the mark—inasmuch as, without a parsimony which no generous spirit could practice, that amount is less than his expenses at Washington. Raise, rather than lower, the standard of remuneration, and you make a great stride towards abolishing the system of "lobbying," which annoys the honest legislator, while it tempts and corrupts him who is weak-minded. Economy, which subjects public men to such influences as these, opens the way to a thousand evils, and may truly be described as "penny-wise and pound foolish."

LETTER FROM JOHN MITCHEL.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., Aug. 20, 1856.

MY DEAR MEAGHER—I send you an extract of a letter which I have received from John Martin; you can print it if you think it worth while to trouble the public with any thing more upon a subject so personal. To me it seems quite right to let the world know what extreme care and diligence the British Government condescends to exercise for the purpose of blackening three political enemies. That the Emperor Louis Napoleon should lend his Press-censorship to serve their purpose is nothing surprising: yet it is both surprising and humiliating to find a man of spirit and ambition, like Emile de Girardin, waiting for the permission of "the Allies," until they shall decide whether it will suit them to give publicity to a letter in simple vindication of private personal character. That the censorship at Paris was guided in this matter by the exigencies of British policy is certain. And it is a mere affair of business and quid pro quo: for if the Presse, or Debats were to print what is offensive to Lord Palmerston, why the Times and Globe might open their columns to Victor Hugo or Ledru Rollin.

Here is Martin's account of the matter to me:—

"Before leaving Paris, I made an effort to remedy the effect produced in France by the uncontradicted calumnies of the English papers. I wrote a letter in French, in which I stated some of the facts of our case, and protested against the charge of the British Minister—saying that you three [meaning McManus, yourself and myself] would gladly be judged upon that question of honor by the French, as you had caused yourselves to be judged by the Americans. I think my letter was quite unobjectionable in spirit and manner, and calculated to make French readers consider the case before accepting the English statement. O'Doherty signed it (O'Brien was in Greece)—I carried it to the office of La Presse, which has the largest circulation of the French papers. On the third day, after interviews with two redacteurs, I was told that M. de Girardin declined to print it. An application at the office of the Debats was equally disheartening. I suppose the French Government did not choose to let the papers do, in behalf of such wretches as the Irish, what might offend the English."

But John Martin's efforts did not end here. He wrote to the Dublin Freeman's Journal a note, the substance of which he gives me as follows:—

"That I desired, previously to my re-appearance in society in Ireland, to provide that people should not receive me under a misapprehension of my real sentiments upon some very serious questions. And, therefore, I begged leave to say, that I felt and knew that I had always had as good a right to live in Ireland as anybody there; that I owed no acknowledgments to the parties [meaning the British Government] whose outrage against law and justice had transported me, and whose permission now admitted me to my country: that for what concerned the conduct of my comrades and myself, which the British Minister alleged as guiding him to select for the "amnesty," or exclude from it—'as a patriot and as a man of honor, I had no higher ambition than to be ranked with Messrs. McManus, Meagher and Mitchel.' Unluckily I kept no copy of my letter, but that was the substance of it. I counted sure of its publication in the Freeman."

Innocent patriot and martyr! It was not published in the Freeman. Mr. Martin had known the Freeman's Journal only in its old character of a national and O'Connellite Repeal paper. He did not know that it has since been bought and paid for by the British Government—mind, I assert this as a matter of fact. He did not know that when Smith O'Brien, in his first public speech after his captivity, emphatically vindicated us in the very same words almost, the Freeman's Journal, while it professed to reprint that Melbourne speech from the Australian papers, carefully cut out of it that portion to which he had specially called the attention of the reporters; because the publication of that portion would be displeasing to its present masters and owners.

So Mr. Martin counted sure of the publication of his letter in the Freeman. Shortly afterwards, arriving in Dublin and finding it had not been printed, he wrote a private letter to the Editor, asking if he had received such a letter.

"I have never yet, he adds, got a line of answer. But it is hardly doubtful that Gray did receive my letter from Paris; and that he chooses to treat my protest with an extinguisher, so far as he can."

Why does not Martin come over here, then, where we print what we please?

You see now of what a conspiracy we have the honor to be the objects. Yet one cannot say that the British Government uses herein more care than is needful. For in the whole matter of their dealings with us from first to last, the one party or the other must absolutely be convicted and branded before the civilized world as most felonious criminals—they, or we. The trial is only proceeding; and it must be confessed that in point of machinery they have the advantage of us. They can pack juries; they can buy up the Press with secret-service money; they can set in motion even the French censorship, through their beloved ally. Yet, we also have reason to thank God that there is one free country in the world.

Your faithful friend,

JOHN MITCHEL.

DEVIN REILLY.

A full report of what was done at the meeting, held on Wednesday last, the 3d inst., to promote the testimonial in memory of this bold and gifted propagandist of Democracy, will appear in our next. It is enough for the present to say, that a sound foundation has been laid, and that with the multitude of zealous and liberal hands which promise to aid the grateful work, a monument is sure to rise, and that within a short time, worthy of the name, the good services, and noble principles of our departed friend.

Nor will it be, as far as we can learn, a monument honoring the dead alone. The household his death has left in darkness and without help, has been tenderly and wisely thought of. There shall be no barren laurel planted on his grave beside the sacred Potomac. The widow and the poor child, to whom that grave is the dearest spot in this wide world, must be cherished and made happy, whilst the husband and the father is remembered.

THE IRISH VOTE.

The practice of appealing to the different races which have flowed in here from Europe is improper in the extreme. It is not patriotic of an American citizen—it is ungenerous and disloyal. We have never done so. Not a syllable has escaped us suggestive even of a desire on our part to control what is called the Irish Vote.

Warmly defending Louis Kossuth against the majority of the Irish people in this country, doing so all the more heartily and proudly that we had to risk our own popularity in the defence; standing by him now in this the bitterest and darkest season of his exile; standing by him as staunchly as we ever did; we condemned at the time, and do now condemn, his assembling the Germans in the Tabernacle, immediately before his leaving for England, and assuming to direct their vote in the Presidential election then pending. No man acquits himself faithfully to the Republic, who upon a question of such vast moment to its interest and renown, introduces foreign topics, addresses himself to foreign partialities and motives, bringing about results from the ballot-box founded upon such appeals and prejudices.

Of the Irish vote, consequently, we should not say a word, now or at any other time, were it not for the prayers and expostulations of which, on the part of the Fremont organs, it is now the object. Appealing to the Irish in America, and appealing to them vehemently, to abandon the Democratic party, we feel fully justified in interposing. Where these appeals are calculated to excite the worst passions—and exciting these passions, are designed to substitute a factious spirit of vengeance for an intelligent devotion to certain great principles—a necessity arises for our speaking, and speaking directly to the Irish-born citizens, which no one can honestly dispute.

The murder of Keating, by Herbert of California, is the ground-work of the appeals to which we allude. The coffin of this poor fellow is dragged into the Fremont gatherings, and the orators of the party use it as Mark Antony used the gown of Cæsar. An Irishman is murdered, and a Democrat is the murderer. Will the Irish vote the Democrat ticket? In the face of that foul butchery, will the Irish support Buchanan? To a party which refuses to expel from Congress the man who dealt the death-blow, will the countrymen of the victim ignominiously adhere? Such is the appeal, of which the weltering corpse of Keating is the inspiration. To render it the more telling, the fact of his having been a poor man, an humble man, a waiter, earning his bread by the sweat of his brow, is prominently set forth. This is to touch the Democracy to the quick.

The morality and logic of the harangue is equally sound. The Irish are to be guided by vengeance in the casting of their votes for the President of the United States! Wheeling round in a mass to Fremont, they are to revenge the death of Keating! Repudiating Buchanan, they will chastise Herbert, bringing on his head a portion of the penalty, from which, through the interposition of an amiable jury, he has escaped!

The Irish in America scout with scorn and loathing this attempt to seduce their votes. The victim being an Irishman, the guilt of the murderer is no greater than if he had been a Scotchman, a Brazilian, or an Ashantee. The criminal being a Democrat does not contaminate the party founded on the philosophy of Jefferson and ennobled in history by the administrative victories of Jackson. The wickedness of its members does not vitiate the religion they profess, nor turn to a plague-house the church to which they subscribe. For the very same reason they are now called upon to secede from the Democratic party, the Irish who are Catholic—and millions of them are so—might as well cease to be Catholics.

It is waste of time, however, to prolong the controversy. The Irish Vote is sound for Buchanan. No profane and vicious appeals over the body of Keating shall wickedly avail. Whilst they deplore the death of their countryman, and execrate his murderer, the Irish citizens of America have too much intelligence not to perceive the very treacherous sophistry and immorality of the appeals we have in these few words condemned.

To the Democratic party they remain resolutely true, for they are true to the Constitution which that party strictly interprets and in all its provisions uncompromisingly sustains.

BLACK AND WHITE.

The Abolitionist Journals affect to be somewhat astonished that we advocate the cause of Mr. Buchanan, who is supported by the Slave-owners, as they choose to term the Southern Interest. Let us set them right, upon this much-vexed question of compulsory labor; or, as Mr. Pierce, in his excellent inaugural, calls it, "Involuntary Servitude."

All labor is, with a few exceptional instances, involuntary. We do not believe the man exists who actually prefers Work to Leisure, Toil to Pastime. Human nature is eminently social. There are a hundred bon vivants to one misanthrope, and there is the same proportion of men who prefer ease and luxury to one who loves to hoard up his gold. Thus, it may be confidently asserted, that no man willingly works, and all labor is, consequently, involuntary.

We have no wish to say anything harsh of manufacturers, but it seems to us, that of the two systems, Southern Slavery is preferable to Northern! In both we behold advantages and disadvantages: the Northern affords to the white laborer choice of employment, employer, relaxation, and, it must be admitted, choice of starvation. The rate of wages is altogther beyond the control of the workmen, for competition has already decided that point for him. He has Hobson's choice, to take the current rate or leave it alone—in other words, starve! There is no help, and however miserable the rate, he has to submit. There is little free choice in this, for the necessities of a family are more potent than the whip of the overseer. Again, should the white slave fall sick, he is at once discharged, for were the employer to pay him for work not done, or in other words, support him while he was incapacitated by disease, he would be raising the price of his own article, and thus allow a meaner man to sell cheaper, and cut him off from his market. Thus Philanthropy would be ruinous to its unhappy votary, and soon drive that virtue from the field, never again to show its face, except as the precursor of bankruptcy! Self-preservation, therefore, would soon leave competition as the great tyrant, and render wages, what they have ever been, the minimum at which human life can be sustained. Very evident is it, that ability to labor is the sole bond between the Northern master and his white slave! Certainly, without going into the abstract merits of Slavery, which is altogether beyond the record, negro slavery has some advantages. We have already shown that the white man's toil is as compulsory as that of the negro; for none, save the few who are born wealthy, can afford to remain idle. In both cases, the southern planter and the northern manufacturer fix the rate of wages, but the negro has certain advantages over his white fellow toiler, since his employer, or owner, is bound, both by law and interest, to take care of him when he is sick, and support his wife and children. He represents value in the eyes of the Southern owner, and he would no more damage his health than he would mutilate or destroy a thousand-dollar bill. This bond of sympathy does not exist in the North. The link is broken the minute one is helpless.

Indeed, we may compare Northern and Southern slavery to the practice of piracy and our own navy. In the first case, when a man falls wounded at his gun, he is left to perish, or thrown overboard to the fish, while in the other, he is carried below to his berth, his wounds dressed, and he is nursed till able to resume his duty.

These are the reasons why we consider that Mr. Buchanan deserves the support of every liberal man, since the peculiar institution of negro servitude is not a jot worse than that of white labor.

GOOD NEWS FROM NICARAGUA.

The last mail from San Juan brings us the brightest assurances of General Walker's success. His government promises to be securely established in Nicaragua. The Padre Vijil has been enthusiastically welcomed on his return. He speaks rapturously about the United States. His words are worth shiploads of bayonets to the cause of constitutional liberty in Central America. A navy, carrying the flag of Nicaragua, is being fitted. The blockade of the ports of San Salvador, Guatemala, Costa Rica and Honduras has been ordered. The pioneer schooner of the Nicaraguan Navy has triumphantly cruised in the bay of Fonesca, intercepting arms and other stores destined for the invading army of Guatemala, and capturing Salizar, the chief conspirator against the legitimate government of Nicaragua. Salizar has been shot. On his person were found letters deeply implicating the British Consul at Leon in the conspiracy which supports Rivas against Walker. The Consul has been ordered about his business. He follows in the homeward track of Crampton and Rowecroft. Dr. Livingston, an American citizen, having been arrested and sentenced to death by Rivas, in retaliation for the execution of Salizar, Colonel Wheeler promptly interposed, threatening Rivas with the speedy interference of the United States government should the sentence be carried out. The sentence had not been carried out when the Cahawba left. Three thousand men—principally Firemen from San Francisco—were on their way to reinforce General Walker's army. On the whole, in every direction, there is the surest prospect that the admirable and noble work begun by that gallant republican will be brought to the happiest conclusion. The Nicaraguense is full of the pleasantest accounts of balls, suppers, levees, and all other kinds of ceremonies and festivities in Granada, in honor of the President, to commemorate the return of Padre Vijil, and in memory of the battle of Las Posas and the Cuban patriots under Lopez. On the other hand, we hear of the troops of Guatemala and San Salvador being diseased and utterly demoralized in Leon, where they still remain, thinking it safer not to come out. We heartily congratulate General Walker on his steady progress in the face of every difficulty.

GOOD NEWS FOR IRELAND.

From our esteemed and excellent friend, John B. Harvey, of Boston, we have received a very welcome letter, from which we think it due to our readers to give the following extract:

A project is now on foot to establish a line of packets between Fall River and one of the Western ports of Ireland—Galway or Limerick. Mr. John Collins, of Fall River, is the originator and prime mover in this affair, and has already received signatures among the American merchants and bankers of his city for twenty-five thousand dollars' worth of stock.

It is proposed to raise one hundred thousand dollars, in shares of one hundred dollars each, and when the stock is all subscribed for, to hold a meeting of the shareholders and mature their organization. It is intended to send one or more agents to Ireland to solicit the co-operation of the merchants, manufacturers, capitalists and patriots of that country.

I am satisfied the plan is feasible, and if carried out to completion, would be a great benefit to Ireland. It would bring the countries into direct intercourse; be of great advantage to Irish manufacturers, who are now obliged to send their wares through the English market, which are afterwards sold here as English goods. Besides, I think it would be a great advantage to the poor emigrant, who, in most instances, is obliged to proceed to England on his way here.

Mr. Collins was here within a day or two and got a good deal of stock taken up. He thinks he will be able to procure the necessary amount among New England Irishmen, and that in early spring two ships at least can be placed on the line.

This is good news. Whatever aid we can give the project shall be heartily given. It is a project in which every Irishman can unite, and for the sake of Ireland we trust it will be resolutely and triumphantly carried out. For the honor of the parties concerned, and the hopes of the country it is designed to bring in closer contact with America, it must not, if taken up, be permitted mysteriously to fall through at the last moment. The name of the place in which it originates will be, we sincerely pray, no evil augury of what awaits it in the future. We are rather more disposed to derive confidence from another name, and to believe that so useful and grand a project will meet with the blessing of Providence.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE EMIGRANT.

We are happy to learn that Dr. Wm. P. Casseday was appointed at the last meeting of the Commissioners of Emigration to be House Surgeon at the State Emigrant's Hospital.

Dr. Casseday has been the assistant of Professor Carnochan, the Surgeon-in-chief to the hospital, in private practice and in the New-York Medical College. He is a young surgeon who graduated at Louisville, Ky., with high honors and afterwards received a diploma from the New-York Medical College. We congratulate the Commissioners and Professor Carnochan, also, on this appointment.

JOHN O'MAHONY.

We have been favored with a letter from Mr. O'Mahony, which, we regret, comes too late for publication this week. It will afford us sincere pleasure to give it to our readers next week.

They will be sure to appreciate it highly. For, couched in the peculiarly vigorous style of the writer, it teems with loving reminiscences of his native valley of the silver Suir, the rolling Cumaraghs, and the old Gaulties—a fond and jealous vindication from an aspersion of cowardice, which he deems our correspondent "Mount Garret the Bag Man" utters against them, of the bold peasantry who gathered around him and supported him throughout his gallant effort in '48, and several interesting particulars, hitherto unknown, of that interesting era, of which, perhaps, he alone is entitled to treat.

We have sincere pleasure in calling attention to the advertisement of our friend Doctor Connery, which appears on another page. We could readily and with pleasure enlarge on his professional, social and charitable worth, but we feel that they are so well known and so highly appreciated in this community that it would be superfluous to do so, yet we cannot avoid remarking the goodness which, amidst such a host of avocations, causes him to devote so much time, gratuitously, to the service of the poor.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

CHRISTMAS WITH THE JESUITS—THEATRICALS AT STONYHURST.

There was the Midnight Mass. In the lofty sanctuary—the silver thuribles swinging up their clouds of frankincense—the tall wax-lights upon the altar—the massive lamp above the Communion rails giving forth its sweet chaste radiance—the painted window, broad and towering, revealing, tier above tier, the Apostles in their purple robes of martyrdom, and the white vestments of innocence, and the circling glories above the meek, the stern, or majestic heads—the great organ, far back in the dim aisle, in solemn darkness, rolling out its noble notes of joy—bright-cheeked children, in snowy surplices, with torches in their hands—gray-heads bending low, clear bells striking, the sacred Host uplifted—in this calm stately spot, in the midst of these perfumes, sounds, and subdued splendor, the Christmas opened.

With thrilling trumpet-tones, the Adeste Fideles—that magnificent hymn with which the soul and genius of the Christian world commemorate the Birth in Bethlehem — turned to clamorous joy the dumb solitude of the night. With piety, with reverence, with glad and loud thanksgivings the day was ushered in. With exultant music, in the midst of smoking myrrh, and the bright flickering of torch and lamp, and the rustling of golden-fibred vestments, and the soft undulation of snow-white robes, and the tinkling of bells, clear as the mountain-stream among the rocks, the star of the Wise Men softened into the dawning sun-light.

All day there was a sweet calm. The play-ground, the corridors, the play-rooms, every place was still. The stillness of a perfumed grove prevailed. Every heart—the giddiest—felt it was a sacred day.

The iron pillars, supporting the ceilings of the play-rooms, were wound round with ivy, with holly, and twigs of the fresh heath which warmed the hills that overlooked the college. The windows of these rooms were darkened with thick drapery, woven, too, from the leaves and branches of the ivy, the holly, and the heath. For the most part, the boys were occupied reading letters from home (they came this morning to every one by the dozen) and did little more than exchange with each other the compliments of the season. The solemnity of the Midnight Mass pervaded the tone and incidents of the day. The sacred concert in the evening—the Jesuit fathers taking part—but deepened and confirmed it. Portions of the Messiah were sung. The band played the Laudite Popoli.

Theatricals formed a conspicuous part of the collegiate course conducted by the Jesuits. They were looked for as confidently as a lesson in arithmetic, or a lecture in hydraulics. Christmas would have been no Christmas without them. Had they been dropped, the boys wouldn't have stood their omission. In that case, there would have been a mutiny. Barricades of desks and stools—bedsteads, pillows, and crockery-ware—thrown up in every direction, the discipline of the college would have been suspended. Suspended is a meek word. It would have been utterly upset. Stonyhurst would never have gone on without its annual farce, comedy, melo-drama, or tragedy.

The theatre was liberal in its proportions, coloring, and gilding. There was an amphitheatre in front—benches in a semicircle rising one above the other, to the height of thirty feet—and a space of twelve feet between the lower bench and footlights. The footlights studded the margin of a platform, two feet and a half above the level of the floor of the amphitheatre. The stage, gradually ascending, stretched away back for forty feet, leaving, behind the back and side scenes, the amplest room for hordes of brigands, shoals of chorus-singers, and crowds of citizens and soldiers. Attached to the theatre was an opulent wardrobe. The armory was well supplied, too. The scenery was boldly and brilliantly painted. The machinery was sumptuous.

There was a large expanse of sheet-iron for thunder. It hung like a rusty tray (with ropes through the handles) from the square uprights supporting the furthermost scene on the rollers. A long deal box (one would think it coffined a salmon-rod) contained swan shot, which, swung about too and fro in its case, rattled and gurgled like rain. There were tin tubes for blowing rosin against the blaze of a mould candle. This operation produced lightning. It was simple but splendid. In King Lear I became acquainted with this secret.

I was in the school of Rhetoric. The Rev. William Johnson was my master. Very gentle, very kind, with the softest whisper for a voice, with an awkward action of the arms from the shoulders down, irresolute legs, and a cumbersome preponderance of ears and tongue, his excellencies and defects equally divided the notice of his pupils. They loved him, and they laughed at him. His shirt-collar was enough to destroy an Adonis. The boys he had charge of fired squibs at him. Had there been a necessity—the faintest threatening of danger to him—they'd have flung themselves before him, and died for him. Born and bred in Lancashire—an Englishman to the marrow—fearful somewhat of O'Connell though constantly reciting Tommy Moore—he couldn't bear the Irish brogue. It was to him a sickening vulgarism. His handkerchief (it was never without holes and blotches) covered his mouth and roseate nostrils, whenever a "bekase" or an "arrah" exploded within range of his hearing. These, to be sure, are barbarous words. Many and many an Irish ear would be hurt with them. But the sweetest words—Athenian or Arcadian—a stanza from Anacreon or a verse from the Canticle of Solomon—uttered with an Irish accent—uttered with the rich roll of the Milesian tongue—was enough, and more than enough, to give hysterics or nausea to the Rev. William Johnson, Professor of Rhetoric.

"Meagher," he used to say, coughing into his handkerchief, and looking as if the interposition of a basin would soothe him, "that's a horrible brogue you have got."

He would try me, however. He had the management of the tragedy. The Professor of Poetry—the Rev. Mr. Clough—had the comedy and farce. King Lear, as I have said, was the great piece of the season. Young Harrison, of Chorley, was assigned the part of the king. A comical fellow, named Quigley, born in Boulogne, of Anglo-Irish parents, undertook the fool. He was never more at home than in his bells and slippers. One of the Beaumonts, of South Wales, assumed the beard, blind eyes, and hoarseness of Gloster. A tall, lithe, handsome lad—one of the Walmsleys scoured the moor of green baize as Mad Tom. His pure olive complexion and finely-pencilled features and eyebrows should have won him an Earldom. No females being permitted on the stage—within the College walls under any pretence whatsoever—the daughters of Lear were transformed into sons. A few strokes of the pen did it. Thus it was that Cordelia was a fair-cheeked, light-laughing, limber-limbed boy. His name was Alfred Weld. A gentle, intellectual, studious, sweet-souled boy. In manner, having all the grace and delicacy and softness of a girl. In mental labor, in high-toned propriety, in steady devotion to religious practices, he was a heroic man. With all the exquisite mildness—fresh, glistening, fragrant as the morning dew—he had the strength of the fir which conquers the severity of the winter, and with the docility and chastity of an Aloysius, had, in his small frame and weak limbs, the intrepidity of a Xavier. He is now one of the Professors of Stonyhurst, having gone through the severe novitiate of Hodder. To predict that he will be a shining light in the pulpit, would be to exaggerate. An amiable member of the illustrious Order of Jesus—kind, patient, winning and zealous in the discharge of his duties—this he will prove himself. So far as one gentle life can do so, he will propagate the influence and celebrity of the pious, chivalrous, noble community to which he belongs.

The principal Knight in attendance on the King was my friend, James Corry, of Preston. A raw-boned, lazy, strong, good humored fellow, he had one of the biggest hearts in the world, and the pleasantest face. Buckled up in a stiff suit of silver-gilt pasteboard—breast-plate, helmet, and gyves—he stalked across the stage, up and down behind the side-scenes, and through the Green-room, without uttering a word. His armor was so tight and inflexible he could hardly breathe. To laugh was impossible. A sneeze would have killed him. Sitting down was a convenience not to be thought of. The use of his joints was completely destroyed. All he could do in that way was to lie down at full length on a hard sofa close to the prompter. Or rather he was stretched out there twice during the first night's performance, by a company of Goneril's soldiers. Motionless and rigid, he looked like a mildewed Crusader in brown stone, on the broad of his back, on the slab of a sepulchre. The difficult position he placed himself in with his armor, may be inferred from the fact of his having to be fed by an assistant during the acts. Ham sandwiches were distributed to the performers whilst the drop-scene was down. Lemonade, also, and weak sherry negus went round. Corry couldn't bend his arm sufficiently to get a bit or a drop to his mouth. Standing bolt up against the wall—massive and stiff as a sarcophagus—Oswald, Steward to Goneril, the Physician, or some other considerate Samaritan, held a sandwich against the Knight's teeth, whilst he eat his way through it, or poured a drink down his throat. When a fly chanced to perch on his nose or his eyebrow, his agonies were maddening. He had to call on a scene-shifter, or some other spare hand, to come to the rescue and ease him. That armor was to Corry what the shirt of Nessus was to the son of Alcmena. It did not stick to him, however, and starve him to death. Eleven years ago he walked out of it, substituting for the hard shell which had so worried him, the Jesuits' black gown—a flexible robe of the humblest material.

The part assigned me was that of the Earl of Kent. The night of the full-dress rehearsal, (a week before Christmas), I had hardly uttered these words—

> "Fare thee well, King; since thus thou wilt appear, > Freedom lives hence, and banishment is here"— before the manager, the Rev. Mr. Johnson, striking me on the back of the head with the large manuscript copy of the play, cried out, in a fit of disgust—

"'Twill never do, Meagher—that frightful brogue of your's will never do for Shakspeare."

Nevertheless, with the sweetest composure I continued the speech, the entire Court laughing—King Lear himself, forgetful of his gray hairs, knitting his eyebrows and pinching his wrinkled nose to keep down his merriment—whilst the enraged manager endeavored to drown my beautiful brogue with exclamations of horror.

> "Thus Kent, O princes, bids you all adieu; > He'll shape his old course in a country new."

With these words on my lips, bowing gracefully and mournfully to the nobility, I retired to the sofa on which the Knight was shortly to stretch himself. Up hurries the manager, shakes the manuscript at me, and growing very red in face says—

"Meagher, 'twill never do—I must degrade you from the Peerage—I'll give Clifford your part. You'll have to be a common soldier; you'll have to bring in the stocks for Kent, carry a brownbill in the battle scenes, make thunder and rain in the tempest, and turn the wind."

That night I had to give up my hose, my scarlet velvet hat and feathers, my silk cloak and sandals, my sword and jacket—everything that pertained to my Earldom. Clifford received them from me; and in exchange I received from him a tin helmet, a breast-plate of leather, a pair of buskins, and a battle-axe and spear. It wasn't the first time the brogue entailed a forfeiture of title and estate. I felt I was a martyr to the peculiarities of my race. The sandwiches and negus consoled me. The common soldier had as much of both as the Earl. Besides, I had my revenge. I fastened my successor so tight in the stocks the first night of the public performance, that he had to be carried off the stage (stocks and all) before his legs could be freed. In the battle on Dover Cliffs, I used the battle-axe and spear with impetuous strength. I cut a rock in two—wounded Lear in the thigh—upset Cordelia—and hotly pursuing the Fool, who had no business there at all, tumbled against the manager, who tumbled against a drummer, who, in his turn tumbled over Mad Tom.

During the storm on the Heath, my revenge was magnificent. Not in vain did Lear, with his hoarse wild voice, cry out—

> "Blow winds, and crack your cheeks! rage! blow!
> You cataracts, and hurricanoes, spout!

With the frenzy of a fiend, I rattled the thunder, shook the rain-box, twirled the handle of the wind-mill. The lightning I made was terrific. It kept the Heath in a blaze. To no purpose did the Rev. William Johnson call "Silence—stop that lightning." I answered him with a stunning peal or a blinding flash. In vain did he beseech the winds to abate their fury Hurricanes followed quick upon his prayers for peace. Lear threatened to kick me (the moment he got off the stage) for keeping up a deafening whirlwind during his prophecy about heretics and tailors, brewers and cut-purses. The Physician (he was one of the Cliftons of Yorkshire) threw some camp furniture at me. The Manager, even above the wind and thunder, was heard to exclaim—"You'll be flogged for this, Meagher—I'll make Rome howl."

In the Fourth scene of the Fourth Act, where I had to enter as a Messenger, I ran away with Quigley's (the Fool's) cap, and with this on my head, and a sandwich in the same hand with the battle-axe, walked in magnificently, saluted Cordelia, and, with the most powerful brogue I could muster, announced that

> "The British Powers were marching thitherward."

The audience received the announcement with an enthusiastic cheer, insisting vociferously on my repeating the message.

The Irish brogue triumphed. It drew down the house in a tumultuous encore. The only other passage encored, was the death of Gloster's servant. The servant got up, despite the mortal thrust of Regan's sword through his back, and, in obedience to the complimentary call made on him, handsomely died over again.

HEART-STEALING.

I speak not of a star that shines
Millions of miles from me,
Of pluming birds, and flowers rare,
Born o'er the eastern sea;

Nor of the net of perfect form,
Suspended on the sweetbrier tree—
Though dripping with the tears of night,
'Tis not the theme for me:

I sing a little simple girl,
Who spreads no web of toil,
The music of whose footfall light
Sounds on an Irish soil.

This guileless girl, with careless ways,
Has stolen my nightly rest,
Filched with her thoughtless careless ways
The heart from out my breast.

And now I'll track her careless path,
From me she shall not flee—
I'll steal her heart, and simply cry,
"You did it first to me."

SHINE BRADSTONE.

OUR LOUNGE.

Generally speaking, every man knows how to work—that is easy enough. The grand necessity of life, like a bayonet, charges us on, and to stop for a minute, is to be crushed beneath the grand Juggernaut of Despotic Duty. Like horses in a mill, we are harnessed and blinded, and so from day to day we run our round! But, though all know how to work, how few know how to unbend! The majority are so accustomed to this everlasting task, that they feel like fishes out of water when they find themselves wide awake on a Sunday morning!

In England and America—indeed, in all great commercial countries—work is the rule, recreation is the exception; whereas, philosophically considered, they are the halves of a pair of scissors. Night and day are not more necessary to each other than recreation and labor. Alas! a man now is an eternally bent bow, which loses its spring by always being kept upon the stretch.

Fully impressed with this great fact, we resolved, after a hard day's work at our office—at which we had received Georgian senators, old-country friends, enthusiastic poets, and self-denying patriots, with a long et-cetera of pleasant persons—to unbend our editorial bow and take a stroll among the theatres. How that little word reminds us of our early days, when we were first placed vis-a-vis to that grand mystery, the Green Curtain. We need not say what theatre it was, whether Dublin, Waterford, or Londonderry, but what the veil of Fate is to the dwellers in this world, the Green Curtain was to us in those days of the dreamy hours. We remember sitting before that "verdant mystery," or Green Curtain, which, not being long enough to come down to the flooring, allowed our vision to see the feet and ankles of the otherwise mystery-hid spectres behind, giving a provoking intimation of a world behind which we were not allowed to behold or comprehend. Who, or what were on these mysterious pedestals, was a puzzle which was solved directly, as the curtain rose. Alas! those incomprehensible feet belonged to beings formed like ourselves, but robed, like the angels, in white garments and spangles. Eheu! what a humbug is hope, or expectation?

But now to our recreation, after the hard labor of these spontaneous reflections.

Our path being up Broadway, of course, led us first to Wallack's theatre. We gave a somewhat fanciful sketch of this Summer Garden in our last, and we still feel its orange groves breathe their breezes on our brow, and their aerial kisses to our lips! Blandly and beneficently we blow them back again to the appreciative readers of the IRISH NEWS!

Passing the courteous treasurer, Mr. Moss, we found ourselves in the Arcana, and simultaneous with our entrance, the Curtain rose on "Victor and Hortense." The chief parts are by Dion Bourcicault and Agnes Robertson. It is a sensation play! Very Frenchy, very sketchy, and very effective! Like most French plays, there is little moral in it; indeed, the moral is Sentiment. Just as though champagne and sardines would make a man as strong as meat and poteen! It was very nice, very pretty, almost poetical at times. But it only called upon the laced cambric handkerchief, scented with Ottto of Roses, and not upon the great Human Heart!

The plot turns upon a lady, whose father was one of the bourgeoise, and whose mother was of a noble family. The father was a "blot in the 'scutcheon," and, although the aspiring daughter of this mongrel marriage had endeavored to banish all recollection of her mother's mesalliance from the world's memory, by adopting the mother's name of Lavalette, and repudiating the father's of Bernard, the Court decided she was plebeian, and ordered the armorial bearings of her mother's noble family to be defaced from her chateau. Thus at a blow, the great object of her life was destroyed, and we see how small a creature the Aristocrat is when cast into the utter darkness and gnashing of teeth of the Plebeian world! Discovering at this moment that her uneducated, but brave groom, who has twice saved her life, and who has long cherished for her a secret passion, is the son of a noble family, she, to his utter astonishment, but overpowering delight, offers to marry him, on condition that he swears solemnly never to enter Paris or Versailles—to both of which she affects an enormous hatred. He gives the oath. The marriage is performed, and to the utter dismay of the enamoured groom (alias Duke St. Clair), his wife orders her carriage—drives to Paris—reminds him of his oath—makes the estateless Duke a present of her own chateau, and blows a kind of kiss to him, through the agency of her steward and writing-woman. The curtain falls to an enormous quantity of virtuous indignation of Bourcicault, (who performed the part of Victor,) in which he was most thoroughly seconded by the audience—one of whom really gouged his left eye out with a bouquet as large as Barnum's elephant, and who soon after nearly crippled Johnstone for life with another, which evidently was composed of hollyhocks and red cabbage!

The next act turns the tables upon the fair aristocrat, and very well did the Fairy Star transform herself into the Norman Ruby of arrogant munificence, which considers a rent-roll as an equivalent for a heart's devotion, and as a sliding scale for every sacred aspiration of the soul.

In the mean time, the Revolution has happened! The aristocracy is abolished. The title, which Hortense gained by an unworthy trick, is her danger! She is proscribed, pursued, and the Jacobites are upon her track. Her despised husband has, on the other hand, by repudiating the empty breath of his rank, become a Colonel in the service of the Republic, and he is thus enabled to save his repentant wife's life. The curtain falls to a great chorus of domestic content, in which, as a happy married man ourself, we most devoutly joined. We confess to much admiration of the acting, but little of the play. It was too mechanical! The playwright's hand was visible everywhere! The poet's touch was altogether banished! There was no impulse—no one gush of true feeling, so far as the dramatist was concerned, but every thing fitted in, as though it had been made to measure. It is a drama written by inches, but not by the heart! Here, however, our censure must end. Nothing could be more finished than the acting. Bourcicault's make-up as the game-keeper groom was excellent, and his delivery very telling. Johnstone had a part that fitted him, and he made the most of his figure in it. Mrs. Cooke was excellent as the vulgar toady to her aristocratic mistress, and delivered a series of withering contempts on the common people worthy of a Sutherland, with an unction, which made her would-be victims roar with laughter. The great gem of the whole was Agnes Robertson, whose Hortense would have been perfect if she were only twenty pounds heavier, and had a little more muscle in her "bright little body," as our friend Pierce Pungent calls her. Her performance was very charming, very piquant, very pathetic, but it lacked force. Nevertheless, it drew many tears from the eyes, and many cambrics from the pockets.

We had not heart to see her in the "Printer's Devil," and so we went to the Bowery, to finish our lounge, and got in just as "glorious John" was commencing Pocahontas. What an Olympian revel of savage life that Burlesque presents. How he swaggers, just as the Royal Tuscarora would have done in his wigwam of the Bowerie! How he smokes his calumet—sings his song—takes his toddy out of a calabash—chaffs that fortunate filisbuster, John Smith, Jr., of Arkansas, and in a spirit of genuine hospitality, invites him to take a cold chop, (for his head,) or a steak for his body! Our friend, John Brougham, in this character, puts us in mind of a grampus in the Atlantic. He rolls about, and snorts, just as though he felt he had room for his fins; not that he is by any means a finical fellow, but a very perfect, finished savage, worthy of the name of our friend of the literary department.

Miss Denham won a smile from our editorial face, which she acknowledged very prettily, and which gave us a high idea of wigwam breeding. With the music ringing in our ears we sought our hotel, and dreamed of being a French Duke, a Tuscarora cannibal—eating Horace Greeley, and awoke in the act of choking, having incautiously swallowed the Life of Fremomt!

Mr. J. R. Johnson, the talented artist of Cincinnati, has been sent on by the citizens of Ohio to the residence of Mr. Buchanan, to paint his portrait. Mr. Johnson has nearly completed the picture, which, we are told, is most striking and life-like.

ILLUSTRIOUS IRISHMEN ABROAD.

Translated from the Biographie Universelle.

COUNT PETER DE LASCY (NOW LACY).

Born in 1678, in the County of Limerick, Ireland, he quitted his country in 1691, after the capitulation of the city, and repaired to France with his uncle, John De Lascy, then Quarter-master General. He next accompanied him to Italy, where he served as Lieutenant in the Irish Regiment, under the command of Catinat. His uncle was killed at the battle of Marsiglia. The Regiment of Athlone, in which he served, having been reconstructed after the peace of Riswick, De Lascy entered the service of Austria, which was then at war with the Turks; but peace was concluded soon after his arrival in Hungary. He then passed into the service of the King of Poland, and later into that of Peter the Great, who had requested the latter to send him some officers to discipline his troops. De Lascy accordingly received the command of a Russian company, and joined the campaign against the Swedes, under Marshal Scheremetof. His valor soon recommended him to the favorable notice of the Czar; promotion rapidly followed; and he was Brigadier of the army in 1709, when he was wounded at the battle of Pultawa, where he commanded the right wing. In the following year he was charged with the grand assault on Riga. He contributed much to the capture of this place, and, as a reward, was appointed Governor.

In 1711 he made a campaign against the Turks, and after the peace of Pruth, returned to fight against the Swedes, and directed the siege of Tonningen. In 1719, he swept the Baltic with a numerous fleet, and made several descents on the coasts, which the inhabitants had cause to rue. The year following, Peter the First made him Lieutenant-General, and in 1721 commissioned him to penetrate into Finland, where, as General De Lascy himself expressed it, the Russian army advanced, carrying fire and desolation into every part of it. These ravages lasted for two campaigns, and peace alone put an end to them in 1722. After this the Czar called him to St. Petersburgh, where he loaded him with honors, and appointed him Commander-in-Chief of the Infantry. After the death of Peter the Great, De Lascy enjoyed the same favor with his successors. The Empress, Catherine the First, appointed him Governor of the Province of Livonia. In 1734 he commanded an army against the Poles, and passed thence into Germany, at the head of an auxiliary corps. He came as far as the banks of the Rhine, where he remained under the command of the Prince Eugene, who was making his last campaign. On his return to St. Petersburgh, De Lascy received the brevet of Field Marshal, and was charged with the command of the siege of Azof, which he took after a most determined resistance. He obtained still greater successes against the Turks, in concert with Marshal de Munich. Having returned into Finland, he distinguished himself in several actions, and took Willmanstrand by assault in 1742. The year following, the Empress Elizabeth gave him the command of a powerful fleet, destined for some grand enterprises, but it was wholly employed in making observations, until the peace of Abo put an end to hostilities, and to the martial deeds of De Lascy, who thenceforward lived in retirement on his estates, in Livonia. At his death, in 1751, he was Governor of this province. The Prince de Ligne has published, in a collection of his works, a journal of the campaigns of Field Marshal de Lascy.

JOSEPH FRANCIS MAURICE, Count de Lascy, son of the preceding, was born in 1725, at St. Petersburgh; entered the army at an early age; passed into the service of Austria in 1744, and made his first campaign in Italy, as aid-de-camp to Count Browne. He had three horses killed under him at the battle of Velletri. He acquired still higher distinction in the following campaign, and signalized himself particularly at the siege of Maestricht in 1748: his gallant conduct here procured him the rank of Colonel. He had the honor of saving the Austrian army in 1756 at Lowositz, when he received a severe wound. As a reward for this service he was appointed Major-General; took an active part at the victory of Breslau, November 22d, 1757, and was made Lieutenant-General, and Chief of the Staff-office. It was to his arrangement that Marshal Dawn was indebted for the victory of Hoch Kirch in 1758. The grade of General of Artillery, which De Lascy obtained the following year, was the reward of this new service. In 1760, at the head of fifteen thousand men, he penetrated almost up to Berlin. This daring expedition procured him the Collar of Commander, of Maria Theresa; and in 1762, his Sovereign sent him a Marshal's baton, accompanied by an autograph letter. After the peace, he entered the Aulic Council, and prepared the plans of reform, which rendered him so celebrated in the reign of Joseph the Second. It is to him that Austria owes the plan of fortifications for the Bohemian frontiers. He caused the fortress of Koenigsgratz to be repaired, and those of Theresienstadt and Josephstadt, the admiration of all military men, to be constructed anew. These enduring services procured him the Grand Cross of Maria Theresa. Entrusted with the command of the Austrian army, in concert with Count de Hadick, under the command of the Emperor Joseph, he was preparing to play a distinguished part in 1778, at the death of the Elector of Bavaria, who was the cause of war breaking out between Austria and Prussia, but the peace of Teschen, on the 13th of May, 1779, restored him to his ministerial labors, which he followed up, after the death of Maria Theresa, with great activity. We are unable to discover whether or not De Lascy introduced much order or economy into the administration of war. He made himself numerous enemies at Court, but his was the common lot of the Sully's, the Gilbert's, the Turgot's, and all ministers who are determined foes of abuses, and wise dispensers of the public money. In 1778, Joseph the Second, wishing to command the army in person against the Turks, took Marshal de Lascy as his counsellor; but this campaign was unsuccessful; and De Lascy, although no friend of Landon's, did not hesitate to point the latter out as the only man fit to retrieve the honor of the Austrian army. General de Lascy possessed the most brilliant military talents, and exhibited well-tried activity and indomitable perseverance in war. His experience and perspicacity in the field of battle were often of immense advantage to the Austrian arms, and especially to Marshal Dawn; but he formed a system of lines and cordons which occasioned great disaster in the war against the Turks, and in the first campaign against France; and we must admit that he was better adapted to serve his country in the cabinet than in the field. He died in Vienna, November 30th, 1801, and was interred in the tomb which he had previously erected in the centre of the gardens of Newaldeck. Prince de Ligne has left us a very brilliant account of him. O'MEGA.

Literary and Artistic News.

"Guardian Angel" is the title of a neat and highly interesting volume, says the Fulton county Republican, written by Miss Caroline M. Congdon, a young lady in her 15th year, residing in Otisco, Onondaga county. Miss C. is the daughter of a poor widowed mother, and is sorely afflicted with a spinal disease, and to give our readers an idea of the manner in which she wrote the beautiful poems contained in the "Guardian Angel," we give an extract from a sketch of the authoress: "Such is the nature of her affliction, that it renders her entirely helpless, except the use of her hands, and confines her constantly upon her back. She writes with a pencil on a little frame which stands across her breast, and so arranged with small wires passing horizontally across the under side, and fastened at each end so as to hold her paper, slipped in between the wires and the board, at an angle of about thirty degrees over her face, thus making her writing-desk lean over her instead of her over it."

Speaking of the inexhaustibility of books, the London Atlas says: "Books are the cause of books. Where there are no books it might be difficult to write one; but because there are so many, there may be as many more. The rays of intellectual light are, by the prismatic operations of books, broken into an infinity of lines and colors. Men may as soon cease to talk, as to cease to read and write books. All our daily and hourly talk may be matter of literature, aye and of interesting literature, too. The more books there are printed, the more food is given to the mind; and the more nourishment the mind receives, the more vigorous are its powers; and the greater its strength, the more valuable its thoughts, and the more valuable its powers and capacities. There is no one topic in the whole range of literary interest that can be conceived capable of exhaustion; and in matters of imagination there is no intellectual foresight, however sagacious, that is cagable of conjecturing what may be done."

The report presented to the shareholders of the Paris Exhibition Palace Company, shows a deficit of 3,673,644 francs, which reduces the value of each share from 100 francs to 71 74-100. The Agricultural Exhibition produced 230,000 francs, whilst the expense of fitting up the premises for it were 500,000 francs. It is impossible to make the building pay; and hence the report recommends the shareholders to accept the sum offered by the Government, as purchase money for the concern, 3 fr. 20 c. as rente for every 100 franc share. This the shareholders have hitherto refused to accept, and the affair is again to be discussed at a general meeting.

Mr. Heywood recently gave notice, in the House of Commons, of a motion (which has been postponed for the present) praying that her Majesty would give directions for the appointment of a Royal Commission of learned men, well skilled in the original languages of the Holy Scriptures, and proficient in modern Biblical scholarship, to obtain the sense of the learned in amending the present authorized version of the Bible, to point out errors of translation, and indicate such words and phrases as have either changed their meaning or become obsolete.

O. J. Victor, Esq., one of the editors of the Sandusky (Ohio) Register, a gentleman of fine talents and some reputation as a poet, and Miss Meeta Victoria Fuller, a very well-known literary lady, have recently been married. Mr. V. is a brother to Miss Matilda Victor, Preceptress of St. Mary's Female Seminary, in our city.

John Adams was at one time called upon by some one to contribute to foreign missions, when he abruptly answered: "I have to give for that purpose, but there are here in the vicinity six ministers, not one of whom will preach in each other's pulpit. Now, I will contribute as much and more than any one else to civilize these six clergymen."

Prof. Agassiz has made an interesting communication on the turtles of North America, to the Boston Natural History Society. He has collected specimens from all parts of the country, and he thinks he has obtained one or more individuals of nearly every species of North America, and that he has alive, in his yard at Cambridge, all but three species to be found in the United States proper.

It is understood in musical circles that Mr. Eugene A. Weiner, an artist of high European reputation, intends to give, early next fall, a series of concerts in this city. Musical judges who have listened to De Meyer, Gockel, Mason, and other distinguised artists, testify that Mr. Wiener has no superior on the Piano. In the performance of the most elaborate and rapid passages, and in the execution of extempore variations, his admirable talent is displayed.

The Imperial Library of St. Petersburg has been enriched with a magnificent copy of the famous Sanscript poem "Baghava-Geta," so esteemed by the learned in Oriental literature. This work was presented by a Russian named Kossowitch, who received the manuscript from the hands of an aged Hindoo, who died some years back in the Russian capital.

Of the £826 voted by the English Parliament for the promotion of learning, £200 has been awarded to Irish literary merit—£100 to Samuel Lover, the novelist, artist, dramatist and song-writer; and £50 each to Dr. O'Donovan, the Celtic scholar and antiquarian, and Mr. D'Alton, the topographical historian.

The library of Dr. Percival, who died at Hazel Green, in Wisconsin, a few weeks since, is to be sold by his administrator, Dr. Jencks, who was also constituted, by will of the deceased, his sole heir. The library is said to consist of six or seven thousand volumes, many of them valuable and rare, and is supposed to be worth $30,000.

Doctor Von der Hagen, a well-known name among the learned Professors of Germany, died on the 11th of June last, at the ripe age of seventy-six. In the course of a long and active life devoted to laborious study, he had done much for the advancement of German literature, and the purifying of the German language.

Heidelberg has sustained a loss in its mathematical professor, Dr. Schiviens, who died on the 16th July, at the advanced age of seventy.

It is in contemplation to erect a monument to Handel, at Halle, his native town, a subscription having been opened among the inhabitants for that purpose.

Miscellany.

Eighty Years a Prisoner.—A hardy old man recently passed through Lyons, France, on his way to Savoy, his native country. No less than eighty-one years ago, when he was forty, he was sentenced to the French galleys for life for some crime. At the commencement of our revolution, being then a middle-aged man, he was shut out from the world. The other day he was released at the age of one hundred and twenty-one. No cause is assigned, but the probability is the Government thought he had worked out more than a natural life in the galleys, and that he was past doing any harm. It is said that he has a little property in Savoy, the interest on which has been accumulating exactly one hundred years, or since he arrived at the age of twenty-one. The old man enjoys perfect health, although he stoops so much that his face almost touches his knees.

The above paragraph we copy, says the Glasgow Chronicle, from an Italian newspaper. We, of course, do not know upon what ground the Savoyard was released, but we may add, that a condemnation to perpetuity in the galleys in France is considered to have expired after one hundred years confinement. Only one case of an individual having outlived his term of punishment was ever known, and that was a native of a little village in Dauphiny, who, at the age of twenty-one, was condemned to the galleys at Toulon for the term of his natural life. The convict survived his hundredth year of penal labor, and, according to the rule observed, was discharged. From Toulon the patriarchal sinner, numbering in years one hundred and twenty-two, found his way to his native village; but, alas! no one there knew him. Nor did he seek to recal it to the memory of any one, for the next day the melancholy man took the road to Toulon, in time reached it, and on imploring to be received at his old lodgings, was there allowed shelter, and died the next year.

The Nantucket Submarine Cable.—The laying of the fifteen miles of telegraph cable connecting Nantucket with the main land, was successfully performed on the 19th ult. In winter it will be particularly useful in conveying intelligence to merchants, and be the means of saving much valuable property as well as many valuable lives. In laying the cable a steamer was employed and the line run off on a reel. The operation was safely performed, and the greatest speed attained was four miles per hour; the deepest water found was seventy feet. It paid out from a reel 12 1-2 feet long, placed on board the schooner, and requiring eight men to work it. The reel and wire together presented a diameter of 6 1-2 feet, the diameter of the shaft of the reel being eighteen inches. Upon the wire, at intervals of twenty-five feet, were placed leaden sinkers of one pound each, and the weight of the wire and sinkers together was ten tons. During the whole time of laying the wire, communication was kept up with the telegraph office in Nantucket, by means of a battery on board the schooner. The wire cost five hundred dollars per mile, exclusive of the sinkers. This is the longest submarine telegraph of American manufacture that has been laid in this country, and is a highly creditable trophy of American skill and enterprise. There yet remains a break of one mile, a channel way between Sandy Point and Monomoy, across which the wire is to be laid, in order to connect with the line in Chatham. Submarine telegraphs have to be protected from lightning. If a thunderbolt strikes the wire on shore and runs along to the submerged portion it is blown to pieces, if unprotected, and is destroyed. Lightning arresters have to be placed on the shore at each extremity of the line. These arresters consist of two brass plates, with silvered surfaces, laid one upon the other, and a piece of silk between. The wire is laid across the upper one, and if lightning strikes it the fluid passes into the upper plate, burns the silk, and passes through the lower plate to the ground.

Railroads in the World.—The Albany Times has been boiling down some facts and figures, and dishes up the following:

The whole number of miles of railroad in the world on the 1st July last was inside of 50,000 miles. Of this amount more than one half (27,350 miles) is in the United States. Railroads were started in England, and yet in ten years we passed her. At the present time the Model Republic has three times as many miles of Railroads as Great Britain and France united. The following table, showing the miles of railroads in different countries, we clip from a report made to Congress some three weeks since:

In the United States	27,350
Great Britain	8,000
France	2,880
Belgium	531
Russia	422
Italy	170
Sweden	75
Norway	42
Germany	5,800
Spain	60
Africa	25
India	100
Cuba	359
British Provinces	1,600
Panama	50
South America	60

Above we have the miles of railroads in various countries. Let us now look at a few other matters. The average cost of American railways has been estimated to be $40,000 a mile, which is rather over than under the mark. The English railways have cost, on an average, $200,000 a mile; the Belgian railways, $90,000; the French railways, £130,000; the German railways, $56,000. Many reasons may be assigned for these variations. The German and American roads have in general but one track; the French and English two. The principle pursued by the English engineers, who also built most of the French roads, was to avoid abrupt curves and steep gradients, by grading and cutting; hence a large increase of expense.

In this country we dread neither curves or grades. On some of the Pennsylvania lines locomotives have to aschnd eighty feet to do a mile, while on the Erie Road we find curves so short that to go around them at full speed would throw you off your boots. Again, the cost of land in England and France was considerable; its real value being frequently exaggerated by speculation. In America and Germany it was comparatively small: on many of the Western roads it was insignificant. Finally, in England, large additional expense was incurred in Parliamentary and law fees. It is said that the fees to counsel for obtaining a charter for some short roads amounted to as much as $350,000; all of which was of course charged against the road, so as to increase the cost of construction.

Politeness is like an air-cushion—there may be nothing in it, but it eases the jolts wonderfully.

Mormonism in Germany.—The "Latter Day Saints" evince a most extraordinary activity in making proselytes. In Great Britain and the Scandinavian countries their missionaries found a fruitful soil, and gained a thousand converts, mainly among the agricultural classes. From Denmark some of these Apostles to the Gentiles journeyed to Hamburgh, where they firmly established themselves, and have already issued a German translation of the Book of Mormon. They have also penetrated to Saxony, and have succeeded in forming a society of adherents in the city of Dresden, carefully avoiding any collision with the police, who are ever on the alert for new religious sects, suspecting every new doctrine to be a mere cloak for some political plot. The apostles seem to have plenty of funds at their command, apparently derived from England, with which they assist the needy among their proselytes. Several families have recently left Dresden for Liverpool, where they will meet other converts, and continue their journey to the "New Jerusalem in the great interior salt basin of America." On the 1st inst. the Mormon community in the city of Dresden numbered sixty members, belonging to various grades of society, some of them persons of high intellectual endowments. The greater part of these new-born "saints" are making preparations to "forsake the thraldom of the heathens" and journey to the holy city of Nauvoo.

The people's rags are so far from meeting the demand of the papermakers now-a-days, that experiments are making upon all sorts of material to supply the deficiency. The Cleaveland Plaindealer states that a steamer brought down from Lake Superior a thousand pounds of moss for Dr. Terry, of Detroit, who has been making experiments upon it in the manufacture of paper. The Doctors says that moss makes a beautiful white paper, without any preparation of the raw material for the common paper mills. In all respects it is equal to linen rags, and can be found in unlimited quantities on Isle Royale and several other localities in the vicinity, at a very small comparative cost.

THE IRISH VOTE.

SPEECH OF COLONEL LOCHRAINE IN BROOKLYN.

Democracy, gentlemen, is, when reduced to a principle, easily expressed in a few words—hatred of oppression; and I claim to have been a Democrat from my birth to this hour. Born in a land not wholly unknown to fame—a land steeped in grief and stripped by desolation, with a history proud and immortal—with sublime names that glitter like rainbow hues of glory amid the clouds of gloom that hang like a badge of mourning on her skies, I can look back, like many of those around me, to the past, and feel pass through my heart thoughts wet with dews trickling from the stars of memory. I can look back and feel that on my mother's lap I learned the first grand inspirations of Democracy that have only since ripened into more definite and distinguished principles. I saw in her tearful eyes the history of oppression, and learned to hate it. I saw shadowed in her tears the ruin of my race; and when I crossed the blue waters that roll between liberty and tyrants, I carried that sacred principle of Democracy in my breast—it lies close to my heart this day—it shall remain there through life, in death be buried with me, and when I rise, rise with me an emblem worthy of the Heaven to which I aspire.

As an adopted citizen of this republic, I feel that duty demands of me an adherence to those principles; not as an Irishman, for I am opposed unalterably to all men who would here attach themselves to any organization cherishing any nationality distinct from that of American. I care not from what country or clime they come—whether from Hungary, with the fires of Pered and the blood of tyrants on their garments; whether from Scotland, where a Bruce and Wallace left deep tracks in the path of immortality; from Grutlin, and by the sun-kissed waters of Lake Lucerne; from France, the land of the great Napoleon, who formed for himself an alphabet of battles, every letter of which was a victory, and for whom nature became naked that she might cover him with garlands; from Ireland, the home of Grattan, Curran and O'Connell. The fostering and maintaining of distinct nationalities, I am utterly and uncompromisingly opposed to in this country. If a man is not yet incorporated into the great family of the American commonwealth, his duty is silence. "See, hear, and be silent," should be his motto. If he is endowed with the privileges of citizenship, reflection will teach him that he is an American citizen, and that he has become blended and incorporated with the American people; and on all questions affecting the interests of this country he must act, if he acts in the spirit of patriotism, as an American. It is as an American I stand here this day; it is beneath the shelter of the "stars and stripes" my voice is lifted; it is to American citizens I speak upon questions affecting American interests; and when I hear of one set of adopted citizens, for whom I have the most profound respect—their industry and integrity, their liberality and philosophy have ever endeared to me the German people—when I see them organized, no matter how small or large that body, as Germans, to enter this Presidential contest, no matter how pure their motives, as an adopted citizen I must speak against it; as a resident of Georgia, where the name of De Kalb has been inscribed upon her teeming soil, and the Stone Mountain stands up an eternal monumant to his memory, I could not let this opportunity pass without addressing myself to my German friends. Do not imagine me as illiberal or contracted. I like to see the days which bring us back in memory to our mothers' arms duly celebrated with appropriate festivities, for in turning our eyes back to the land where our fathers' ashes lie buried, we but the more strongly evidence and affirm our affections for this in which our children's forms are laid. Ruth, when she joined her destinies with Naomi, and exclaimed, "Thy people shall be my people and thy God my God," was no less a Moabitess although she became the mother of the descendants of David.

There is no fear, I am well satisfied, that any nationality of men would ever subvert our country's institutions and set up any government different from that which has guided this country to her present proud and prosperous position. They, like myself, know too well the contrast between a land where all men are equal in the sight of God, and the scented nuisances of hereditary birth, and their privileges in the land from which they came. They remember too well the greedy devourers of the poor man's labor, and the cruelty which characterizes the act worse than the vampyre, for that will soothe to pleasant dreams while it withdraws the blood of life; but these act with a cruelty that would disgrace a starved menagerie.

It is the principle I am against, because I honestly think it wrong; and were they banded together to vote for Buchanan, as they are for Fremont, I would urge every argument I could against it with equal zeal, so help me God. But I candidly acknowledge my astonishment in this crisis of our country's history, when the union of these States is imperilled, when the clouds around and above us portend a storm that may rend this country in twain, and cast State after State,

"Like a limb from the country cast bleeding and torn."

In this day and at this time, I must admit astonishment that men who claim to be intelligent or patriotic can alien themselves from the Democratic ranks, and be found endeavoring to defeat the only National party left in this Republic, that maintains the only principles sacred to freedom and equality of the States and citizens, that can only interpose as a shield between the Constitution and fanaticism, and save in bonds of paternal love and esteem the Union, formed by revolutionary sires, and handed down as a rich legacy to their descendants; that can alone protect the great Republic of the United States from being slaughtered upon the altar of disunion, while the dews of its baptism are yet wet upon its forehead; to find men endeavoring to defeat this party, and thus trample upon the Constitution, and wreck the country, is to one who desires to see this Government perpetuated, and this light of liberty grow brighter and brighter until its beams are strong enough to reflect upon the Old World, and wake up its people to an emulation of honorable and patriotic example, a fact of solemn and melancholy import. I can only pray God to avert a day so dark, and trust His aid and that of the Democratic party will interpose between us and so black a destiny.

The principles involved in this issue are too well known to need much illustration. The most prominent is that which has reference to the people of a Territory, when forming a State Constitution, preparatory to admission into this Union, having the right to establish or inhibit slavery. In the affirmation of this proposition you find the Democratic party. And let us for a moment inquire if this principle is not the only one that can be carried into effect without a violation of the Constitution.

The Territories of this Government belong to the Government. The Government is formed of the States in common, as confederates, co-equals, and sovereigns. The property, then of the Government is the common property of the States. The citizens of the States occupy a position of equality in the Government, and have a common right to go and settle upon the territory which is the common property. Now, when the men from the North and the South, the East and the West meet there, and leaving behind them friends and relatives, go into the trackless forest, and hew down the trees to let the sun smile upon the land with fruitfulness and plenty; when they build their castle there and plant their household gods, have they the right to a voice in relation to the institutions under which they are to live and be governed?

A man goes to one of the Territories from New-York; he had this right here; no power could deprive him of it. Now, by what process of reasoning or authority will it be shown his removal to the Territory has alienated this right? The right is nothing more than the right of governing himself. Now, can this right be taken from him without making him a slave? If the people of the Territory have not the right to govern themselves, and make their own laws, and shape their own destinies, when does the right exist? Where has it been lodged? Who is its expounder? It is directly in conflict, not only with freedom, but with the fundamental principles upon which the Constitution was founded, to deprive a man of his right, south of the line of 36 deg. 30 min. This right has been recognized by that restriction, acquiesced in by the South for the sake of perpetuating this Government. The North obtained a large accession of free States when the Territories were acquired from Mexico. The South was willing to adhere to the Missouri Compromise, and have it extend to the Pacific. You were opposed to the line then, for the South would have been benefitted by the extension. You established this principle of non-intervention, and thus have the glory of removing an odious distinction in justice to the people of the South, who are your brothers, and cling to you with an affection as warm as the sun which lights up their skies.

The people of the south ask nothing but what is fair, honorable and just; their claim is to go to the common property, and have an equal voice with you in governing themselves there. Suppose the south, when there were twelve slave states and one free, had denied to the citizens of the free state the right to his voice in the formation of institutions under which he emigrated to live, what would have been his condition? A freeman? No, sir; desecrate not the name of Freedom by such an application; call virtue vice and God an Atheist with much more propriety.

Then away with these specious phrases and set speeches about the rights of freemen in the territories, when the principles you assert are in direct antagonism with free speech or the rights of freemen.

No matter from what part of the world a man comes, he is a freeman in this republic. When he comes from the south, that pours her wealth into your lap, sustains your commerce and enriches your manufactories—your brother, glorying in a common history, and sharing with you a common destiny—I ask is he to be less than a freeman? Is the sovereignty of the southern states to be struck down, and her sons denied the exercise of their civil rights equally with you in this government? And do you expect southern blood to be cool and tamely submit to degradation? Spirit of Washington, which sleeps in southern soil!—spirit of Jackson, whose ashes are southern dust!—spirit of Jefferson, of Polk, of Clay, of Calhoun, of McDuffie, and of our own immortal ancestry answer no! with the most indignant asseveration. Orators may taunt, and the Herald gibe the south. They cannot provoke her. Like the British soldiers at Waterloo under the rain of death, they will "stand firm," unmoved amid the storm; and when you enter the halls to enact her degradation, with the aid of northern freemen who yet love and cling to our country's Constitution, she will run you like rats from the Temple—rats that have burrowed beneath its pillars to uproot them, and again unfurl from the capitol the flag of our country, with but one word inscribed on it, and that word the Constitution.

But I anticipate no such evil—the patriotism of the country forbids it—the intelligence of the people forbids it. This storm shall pass—the clouds that lowered over our house shall be in the deep bosom of the ocean buried; and when the skies have cleared, and peace and plenty smile around us, with all hands on deck—with grateful hearts swelling with emotion—our eyes shall see at the helm that pilot who has weathered many a storm, guiding with steady and practiced hand the old ship of State—and landing her safely, with all her passengers safe on board, to anchor at the White House—then shall go up three cheers for Buchanan and Breckinridge, and three more for the Constitution.

We have had heretofore a contest for principles with the old Whig party; but the old Clay banner is now furled—dust and cobwebs gather on it to do the work of death—it will flutter no more in victory, but it shall remain as the herald of a field on which its followers fought bravely, while of its leaders, now in the dust, we may say:

"The meanest rill—the mightiest river—
Roll mingling with their fame forever."

What a spectacle between them and Mr. Fillmore, with his attache Mr. Donelson, sowing dragon's teeth of disunion among the people, and striking down the sacred principles of civil and religious liberty! But I shall not take up your time to discuss his merits or demerits—he is but a spider on the presidential web, easily brushed off. He belongs to a party already staggering to the grave, and I will write no word upon its tomb. It shall soon be coffined clay—soon be among the things that were,

"A school-boy's dream—the wonder of an hour."

The Democratic party has put in nomination men eminent as statesmen and pure as patriots. James Buchanan is a household word. The gray-haired and venerable rush to his support with an ardor equal to their younger or more vigorous associates—his name is interwoven with the history of the country, and will remain there as bright as the crimson blush of the living day. The party that he leads is daily increasing, as the fire spreads by the air that blows upon it. I feel that the country is safe. The young eagle that rose in the luminous track of the setting sun, shall yet soar in safety over the fortunes of this republic, and the Union of the Democratic party in New-York shall be the "rainbow in the skies," betokening a clear and cloudless day for the country.

Lecture of the Very Rev. Dr. Murray before the Young Men's Society of Cork.

THE POETRY OF THOMAS MOORE.

It has been remarked (he observed) by some of Moore's critics, that he is altogether, or almost altogether, a poet of mere fancy, not of passion. That he has not dealt in, or has not successfully dealt with, those stormier passions which constitute the elements of the sublime, I have already admitted. That a great deal of his poetry is that of mere fancy I will not dispute. But I maintain that it contains a great deal, a very great deal, of genuine passion, in its two most beautiful and most popular species, the pathetic and the gay; and I believe that it is on his wonderful excellence in these two, but above all in the pathetic, that the enduring monument of his fame will rest. Under the head of the pathetic I would principally include what, for want of a better name, I call his "Songs of Sorrow," ranging, as they do, from the tones of a tender and tranquil feeling down to those of wailing desolation. There is one feeling of sadness, a favorite theme of his from his earliest to his latest strains—a feeling which he utters in every suitable form of verse, through every variety of imagery, in every cadence of intensity, and with a success so marvellous, so uniformly and absolutely perfect, that I believe no other poet ever attained or approached. I allude to the feeling which arises in the mind from the contemplation of the pursuits, the companions, the friendships, the aspirations, the joys, the sorrows, and whatever else there may be of the features and associations of days long and forever past, of scenes we can never again behold, the days and the scenes of our early years; and, also, what interests often as touchingly, though not as painfully, the mighty deeds, the golden pomps and glories of bygone ages, seen, like those old round towers, through the waves of time in which they have been so long engulphed. For obvious reasons, strains that recall the image of past national glory, find a peculiarly ready and warm-hearted response in the heart of every Irish Catholic. But the memory of our own personal past touches every bosom with a deep and tender emotion. These feelings are in themselves pure and chaste; and, when warmed with the fervor of a devout heart and tinged with the hues of Christian hope, lift the soul above the perishable scene, where all is vanity of vanities, up to that better world "beyond the moon and beyond the stars," where "death shall be no more, nor mourning, nor crying, nor sorrow." By that mysterious attribute of mind, which we call association, it frequently happens that an object or an incident of the most trifling kind, a tree, a flower, an old air, the chime of bells, suddenly flashes some long-past and long-forgotten period of existence fully and vividly upon the mind, just as a small light, struck in a dark, renders it and the objects it contains, visible to the bodily eye. You have an example of this in those lines of indescribable beauty which every one has by heart—"Those Evening Bells! those Evening Bells!" and in another lyric of Moore's, not so universally known, of which I quote the first stanza:

"There is a song of the olden time,
Falling sad o'er the ear,
Like the dream of some village chime,
Which in youth we loved to hear.
And, even amidst the grand and gay,
When music tries her gentlest art,
I never heard so sweet a lay,
Or one that hangs so round my heart
As that song of the olden time,
Falling sadly o'er the ear,
Like the dream of some village chime
Which in youth we loved to hear.

Verses like these, continued the lecturer, are not mere poetry. They are music, too. In proof of his strong and unqualified assertion of Moore's unrivalled excellence in this department, Dr. Murray gave many instances; amongst the rest, one which he thus introduced. Moore stood aloof from the stormy scenes of Irish agitation. His English home, his temperament, his tastes, and the necessity of supporting himself and his family by the labors of his pen, contributed to keep him so. But it should never be forgotten that, though he was domiciled in England from a boy, and almost from the same period to the gathering of that dark cloud that settled on the closing years of his life, he lived on terms of friendship and familiarity with the noblest of the land, the welcome and worshipped star of its proudest and most brilliant circles; yet, in whatever else he may have erred, he remained a true Irishman to the last. On the long, disheartening struggle which our fathers had to wage for free altars in their own land, the splendor of his genius shone out "like moonlight on a troubled sea," gilding the lower elements of strife and ennobling the cause of the down-trodden and the slave. When afterwards the proud and great of his adopted home turned to bind again the victim they had helped to franchise, his manly little heart swelled with honest indignation. And, as appears not only from his poems—for in them he addressed all the world—but still more from his private diary, to the very authors of the wrong, though among his warmest and truest friends (as to him they really were), he manfully and honestly expressed his opinions and his feelings, and in language as warm as the glowing strains in which they are made immortal:

"From this hour the pledge is given,
From this hour my soul is thine,
Come what will, from earth or heaven,
Weal or woe, thy fate be mine!
When the proud and great stood by thee,
None dared thy rights to spurn;
And, if now they're false and fly thee,
Shall I, too, basely turn?
No! Whate'er the fires that try thee
In the same this heart shall burn.

Though the sea, where thou embarkest,
Offers now no friendly shore,
Light may come where all looks darkest,
Hope hath life when life seems o'er.
And, of those past ages dreaming,
When glory decked thy brow,
Oft I fondly think, though seeming
So fallen and clouded now,
Thou'lt again break forth, all beaming—
None so bright, so blest as thou,

The learned lecturer having alluded at some length to the refinement of imagery, feeling and language so characteristic of Moore's lyrics, described that refinement as the great distinction between his songs and those of Burns. Both, he said, are simple; but those of Burns are simple to a wider circle. The latter expresses the feelings of our common nature in the most intense and moving manner. Moore does the same, but infuses into them delicate and refined emotions that are lost on rougher sensibilities. Burns, content with the passion as it is common to all, uses a language common to all. Moore, aiming to embody its more subtle working and developments, uses a language of a finer shade. They are both, beyond a doubt, the two first lyric poets of our literature. The empire of song is theirs; and as I would rather see it possessed by them in common than divided between them, I shall not pursue the comparison farther. If, however, I were constrained to offer an opinion, I should, in my humble judgment, rank Moore decidedly above Burns. The best lyrics of the former appear to me clearly better than the best of the latter; and we have more of Moore's best. After a very charming disquisition on Moore's humorous poems, which space does not permit us to give, but which was heard with great interest and several times interrupted by hearty plaudits, Dr. Murray concludes thus:—I have already contemplated Moore only as a poet. But before concluding, I may be allowed to say one word on the personal character of the brave and loving spirit so lately departed from us—

Silence is in our festal halls,—
Sweet son of song! thy course is o'er;
In vain on thee sad Erin calls—
Her minstrel's voice responds no more.

I have already spoken of his patriotism. His periods of social enjoyment, partly during his occasional visits to London, partly at Bowood and elsewhere, were neither few nor far between; and while they lasted, scarce a moment of them was lost. Though often reluctantly drawn from his retirement and in the midst of his gaieties, sighing for its return, still on whirled the round of pleasures, breakfasts, dinners, suppers, balls, theatres, singing, dancing, laughing, jesting. But when buried in the seclusion of his own home, his life seems to have been very laborious. He wrote much; and he was rather a slow workman. By his pen he not only supported himself and his family in comfort and independence, but also contributed largely to the support of his father and mother to the end of their lives. After struggling hard "to make ends meet," sometimes with only a few shillings in his pocket, he was never guilty of one mean or unmanly act. His heart overflowed with kindness and generosity to all that came within his circle. His temper seems to have been one of unvarying sweetness. All the world admired his genius, and all who knew loved the man. He was the best of sons, a warm and generous friend, a loving brother, a loving father, a loving and faithful husband. In this last relation he was singularly happy, having been united to a lady whose great beauty seems to have been but the reflection of the natural goodness and nobleness of her heart. It was said that he "dearly loved a lord"—said, I strongly suspect, by some one who envied quite as much as they blamed. I think lords sought him as much as he sought them, and a great deal more. Whatever may have been his weakness in that way, I believe few men ever lived, drawn from an humble sphere like his, and thrown as he was, when little more than a boy, into the society of lords—and such lords as some of them were!—and whenever he passed his own threshold, constantly living in their society, who, to the end, preserved the manly self-respect and independence which shine out through every record of his life that has fallen under my eyes. His character is as beautiful as his genius. I speak only of his natural qualities, as I gather my ideas from these sources of information that are open to all. Of him, as in reference to the supernatural, I shall say nothing here. Only be it ours to feel deeply, after contemplating the picture of so much worldly happiness, and splendor, and fame, that after all, the fashion of this world passeth away and but one thing is necessary—as in Moore's own words:

"And false the light on Glory's plume
As fading hues of even:
And love, and hope, and beauty's bloom
Are blossoms gathered for the Tomb—
There's nothing bright, but Heaven!"

American News.

The tripartite treaty between the United States and the Creeks and the Seminoles, residing West of the Mississippi, is considered one of the most important ever concluded with the aboriginal tribes. The Senate recently ratified it, with amendments, to which the delegation in Washington have assented. It appropriates $899,000, for which a bill has passed the Senate, and awaits the action of the House. The Creeks and Seminoles surrender land to such Seminoles in Florida as may remove West, while the treaty secures to the last, on that condition, certain pecuniary and civil advantages, and permits them to enjoy their own—a Seminole—government, independently of association with any other tribes—a failure to obtain which has been a prominent objection heretofore to their immigration. This, it is supposed, will have a tendency to forever quiet Indian disturbances in Florida—an important consideration—in view of the millions of money expended on account of Indian hostilities in that State.

The Louisville Courier 22d ult., says: Catherine Smoot, of Jefferson county, Kentucky, widow of Alexander Smoot, Esq., who died in 1847, was a passenger on the mail boat from Louisville to Cincinnati yesterday, with eleven slaves, whom she proposes to emancipate. She was offered $10,000 cash down for the lot, but said that the money was no temptation, as she would free her servants because she was convinced it was her duty as a Christian to do so. A black man belongs to her who was not with his company, as he hired out for a term, upon the expiration of which he, too, is to be freed. She says, that she considers it her duty, after freeing her slaves, to make such provision for them that they will not suffer or become burdensome to those among whom they will make their home.

The venerable Father Sawyer, of Maine, as he is affectionately called, although a hundred years and several months old, it appears is not the oldest clergyman in New-England. The Manchester, N. He is the oldest graduate of Dartmouth College, and probably the oldest clergyman in the country.

The Toronto Globe, in a recent number, contains a list of the Canadian steamers and schooners trading on the upper lakes, with the names of the masters, the rig, tunnage, where built, and the value. In this list are forty-eight steamers, seventeen propellers, and one hundred and ninety-five schooners, the tunnage of which amounts to about forty-one thousand one hundred and ninety-six tuns, and the value of which is about $3,494,000.

We learn from the St. Louis Republican that the town of Griswold City, located on the Missouri river, one hundred miles from St. Louis, was destroyed by fire on the night of the 20th. The loss of property is unknown—there was no insurance on any of it. The fire is supposed to have been committed by an incendiary.

A NEW COOPER!

JUST PUBLISHED,

SARATOGA,

A TALE OF 1787.

A Romance of American Border Life. One volume, 12 mo., muslin, price $1 25.

American Novelists have of late confined themselves mainly to sketches of social and domestic life. They have aimed to produce miniatures and cabinet pieces rather than historical pictures. The author of "Saratoga" has chosen a large canvas, and has wrought with a bolder hand. By placing the scene of his story on what was then the verge of civilieation, and portraying characters trained in all the exigencies of border life, he has constructed a narrative full of startling incident and thrilling adventure, without violating the probabilities of history. The bold, cautious woodsman, Sandy Brigham, the watchful, taciturn Indian, Catfoot, and wily, vengeful half-breed, Joe, will compare favorably with the best delineations in the "Leather-Stocking Tales" of the great American Novelist. Since Cooper put forth his earlier and better novels, no American author has written a work of this class possessing merits equal to this tale of life on the borders.

The title of this book gives us to know at once the nature of its contents. It abounds in incidents of an exciting character.

Contemplate the Life of Mary!

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing in semi-monthly parts at 25 cents each and under the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

Archbishop of New-York,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

OF HER MOST CHASTE SPOUSE

St. Joseph,

AND HOLY PARENTS

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its general appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably. Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

The work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

INDUCEMENT.

Each subscriber to this splendid work will receive with the last number a magnificent Steel Engraving suitable for framing, of the Special Notices.

Caution to the Public.—To distinguish the genuine magnetic powder, for the destruction of insects, from poisonous imitations, it is necessary to examine the wrapper. See that four national medals—those of England, France, Belgium, and the United States—are engraved thereon. Be sure also that a lithographic fac simile of Lyon's signature appears both on the wrapper and label. This caution is necessary to protect the proprietor from fraud and the public from danger and disappointment. The leading scientific societies, and the first chemists of Europe and America, have pronounced the magnetic powder the only poisonous insect bane in the world, as well as the most effective and fatal means for the destruction of bed-bugs, roaches, fleas, ants, flies, moths, &c., that was ever prepared or sold. The proprietors of the principal city hotels endorse it. Come and see the testimonials of Prince Albert, ex-President Fillmore, and hundreds of the nobility of Europe, as well as the sovereigns of America. The magnetic pills, for the extermination of rats and mice, are endorsed with equal emphasis by all who have tried them. Call and see the medals, diplomas, government orders, scientific certificates, letters, &c., at the Central Depot, No. 424 Broadway.

If you wish a Portrait, call at Brady's Gallery, 359 Broadway. THE AMBROTYPE.—Some members of the daguerrean fraternity have represented the Ambrotype—the latest and best improvement in the art—as unworthy of public confidence. Mr. BRADY, the introducer of the Ambrotype in New-York, has found in them a combination of rare qualities, never approached by any other style of camera pictures. 8m28ju

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter, giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a subscriber to Mr. O'Mahoney's translation of the Foras Feasa ar Erinn.

That is a book long wanted, and which the "Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliot Hudson had lived, it would have been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes, as Mr. O'Mahony.

I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Their Book Trade.

The old established house of Benziger Brothers, Eisiedeln, well known to many of the Hierarchy and the Rev. Clergy of the United States who have visited Switzerland, established this house in New-York four years ago, and they trust they will receive for the greatly increased advantages they offer, a continuance of that support, which for a period of over forty years has enabled them to build up, at the Pilgrimage of Our Lady of the Hermits (Einsiedeln) an establishment in which over four hundred persons are daily employed in the fabrication of the various articles that are used in the Church.

They desire particularly to call attention to their publications of PRAYER and DEVOTIONAL BOOKS, in German, French, Italian and Latin, consisting of over 200 different sorts. Being in immediate and constant intercourse with nearly all the principal publishers of Europe, they are enabled to offer a large assortment of standard THEOLOGICAL and LITURGICAL WORKS, among which are, the editions of Mechline, Paris, Ratisbone, &c., at exceedingly low prices.

Contemplate the Life of Mary!

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing in semi-monthly parts at 25 cents each and under the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

Archbishop of New-York,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

OF HER MOST CHASTE SPOUSE

St. Joseph,

AND HOLY PARENTS

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its general appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably. Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

Th work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but i seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

Th s work translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, w like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

INDUCEMENT.

A NEW COOPER!

JUST PUBLISHED,

SARATOGA,

A TALE OF 1787.

A Romance of American Border Life. One volume, 12 mo., muslin, price $1 25.

American Novelists have of late confined themselves mainly to sketches of social and domestic life. They have aimed to produce miniatures and cabinet pieces rather than historical pictures. The author of "Saratoga" has chosen a large canvas, and has wrought with a bolder hand. By placing the scene of his story on what was then the verge of civilization, and portraying characters trained in all the exigencies of border life, he has constructed a narrative full of startling incident and thrilling adventure, without violating the probabilities of history. The bold, cautious woodsman, Sandy Brigham, the watchful, taciturn Indian, Catfoot, and wily, vengeful half-breed, Joe, will compare favorably with the best delineations in the "Leather-Stocking Tales" of the great American Novelist. Since Cooper put forth his earlier and better novels, no American author has written a work of this class possessing merits equal to this tale of life on the borders.

The title of this book gives us to know at once the nature of its contents. It abounds in incidents of an exciting character.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

European News.

The European mail by the Persia (Liverpool, 23d ult.) is not important, and may be summed up in a few words. Thus:

The British Parliament is further prorogued until November. Napoleon is at the baths of Barritz; he is reported to be urging the claims of Prince Pierre Bonaparte to the throne of the Danubian Kingdom; and to be engaged in considering what title to bestow on the American descendants of Prince Jerome. The harvest in France is considered fully an average. The government of Holland refuses assent to the principle of arbitration before a resort to arms. The citizens of Antwerp have been indulging in fetes to celebrate the King's long and peaceful reign. There is no additional news from Spain; the apprehensions of scarcity continue, and the difficulty with Mexico is said to be by no means settled. It is reported (but doubtfully) that France and England have sent an ultimatum to Naples, demanding concessions, and threatening, if refused, to withdraw their representatives. The King agrees to concede in part, but the ultimatum demands more. The Prussian corvette Dantzig was attacked on the coast of Morocco by Riff pirates; eight of the crew were killed and seventeen wounded, including among the latterPrince Adalbert of Prussia. The dead were buried at Gibraltar, and Prussia invites France and England to join her in an expedition against the buccaneers. Turkey is preparing a new draft of a general commercial treaty, more favorable to the development of her own commerce. The eight or ten Russians have been removed from the Isle of Serpents by an English ship of war, and landed at Odessa. The Russians have occuped Anapa and the forts of the Circassian coast. The papers are full of the magnificence of the approaching coronation at Moscow.

An Austrian Colonel had openly insulted the AmericanVice-Consul in Ancona, Italy, and the latter had demanded redress from the United States Minister at Rome.

The leading English Journals discuss at length the principles of Secretary Marcy's state paper on the doctrine of privateering, as stated by the Congress of Paris, and submitted to the leading powers. We give the pith of the observations made by several leading papers:

* * * After settling the affairs of Turkey, Greece, the Principalities, the Black Sea and the Baltic, after reviewing the position of the Pope and the King of Naples, the Plenipotentiaries at Paris resolved on declaring some general principles for the humanizing, as far as possible, of future hostilities. Accordingly, in the last protocol it is declared that privateering is and remains abolished, that the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, that the enemy's flag does not condemn to forfeiture neutral goods, and that blockades, to be binding, must be effective. These resolutions, when agreed to by the contracting Powers, were sent to several governments for acceptance, and among them to the government of the United States. The answer of Mr. Marcy, the American Secretary of State, has just been published. It is written with no small ability, and will, no doubt, command the attention of European Governments. Mr. Marcy points out the obvious logical defect in the principle enunciated by the Conference. If it be desirable, for the sake of humanity, that private property shall be respected on sea as on land, it must be desirable that its capture by men-of-war should be prohibited as well as by privateers. The European Governments, therefore, says the Secretary of State, have not consistently carried out their own principle. If private property is to be captured, it must be by any species of vessels which the belligerent states choose to employ. Privateers at sea are analogous to volunteer levies on land, and the United States, which have neither a large army nor a large navy, cannot consent to limit themselves to any description of force in defending themselves. A comparison is then made of the naval forces of England and America, and it is added that not only regard for her own safety, but even a sense of what is due to the other small naval powers, obliges the Republic to oppose a regulation which should debar any State from making use of volunteers by sea as well as by land.

Now, there is much truth in this, though the European Governments are not so inconsistent as may seem. They certainly have not taken a broad view of the subject, simply because one or two have possibly deemed that their neighbors were as yet unwilling to countenance any sweeping change. No one can doubt that a country like England, whose commerce covers every sea, would be glad enough to find the whole world agreeing to respect private property on board ship. But it was not quite certain that some of her neighbors would acquiesce in a doctrine which would seem to give greater advantages to a nation whose supposed monopoly of commerce already excites the envy of the world.

The Times then proceeds to make the following contrast between the regular navy and privateers:

No doubt the captain and crew of a ship of war are to some extent encouraged by a hope of prize money. But it must be allowed, that officers educated in a high sense of honor, and looking for their reward in reputation and a good standing with their profession and the public, are likely to carry out the system of capture in a very different spirit from mere adventurers united only by a thirst for gain. The crew of a government vessel is subjected to a severe discipline. Its captain is obliged to furnish a strict account of all his proceedings. Very different is the case with the privateer. The crew are generally of the most wild and ruthless of a profession which is apt to encourage a disregard of restraint; theh go anywhere and do every thing with little questioning from their own government. Their responsibility is lessened by their very obscurity, and generally is such that nothing short of actual atrocities could lower them in the opinion of their fellows. In fact, privateering is too apt to degenerate into piracy. The captain of such a vessel will take every advantage, without pity or remorse, while an officer of the regular navy is hardly likely to stretch rights to the utmost, and embitter the contest by cruelty and rapacity.

The History of American privateers gives a direct answer to the falsification of the above. The privateers acting in the wars of America, have been as famous for their chivalrous bearing as for their bravery. The Times continues:

So far, then, the European powers were justified in proposing the abolition of privateering, even if they went no further. But now they are asked to go further. The American Government accepts their proposition, but generalizes the principle. "If," says Mr. Marcy in effect, "you will abolish altogether the right of capturing private property on the ocean, privateering ends as a matter of course; but if you retain this right, we will not consent to limit the exercise of it to any class of vessels." Fi nally the American Secretary moves his amendments. To the words "Privateering is and remains abolished," he proposes to add, "and the private property of the subjects or citizens of a belligerent on the high seas shall be exempted from seizure by public armed vessels of the other belligerent, except it be contraband. Thus, for the first time, a most important principle is proposed for the adoption of the civilized world, being nothing less than the extension to maritime trade of absolute immunity from acts of warfare. It is now a question for the family of nations whether they will decide that a cargo of sugar on the Atlantic is as sacred as the same article stored in the warehouses of a captured sea-port. It is evident that if the proposition of the United States be adopted, modern warfare will be entirely revolutionized. The subject is of the highest importance, and will no doubt be discussed with earnestness and good faith.

The London Post says:

The only state which from the possession of a great mercantile navy, can on this subject be supposed to have interests not entirely coincident with those of the great European powers is the United States of America. Mr. Marcy, the Secretary of State at Washington, has recently addressed a despatch to the French minister, in which he criticizes with ability and temper the declaration of the 16th of April. It appears from that document that the government of the United States, except upon its own terms, and with a view exclusively to its own objects, is unwilling to sanction the principle of the declaration of the Congress of Paris.

After alluding to the provisions of Mr. Marcy's manifesto, the Post continues:

There remains, then, only one principle or relaxation, to which the United States Government remains strenuously, we may almost say inexorably opposed. Privateering—the last relic of the private wars of the middle ages—abolished by the common consent of the powers of Europe, is still to be retained by republican America, as in some degree a counterpoise to the naval power of England and France. Mr. Marcy argues the case, with great propriety, we admit, solely on American grounds. He deprecates the maintenance, in times of peace, of large naval armaments, and he points out that in case of a war with a great maritime power, the comparative impotency of the United States upon the sea would be supplied by the employment of privateers and letters of marque.

We cannot undertake to say what authority opinion may have in the United States, whether it always conveniently follows present or anticipated self-interest; but this we can assert without fear of contradiction, that all the special pleading of Mr. Marcy in favor of privateering is directly and diametrically opposed to the declared and uniform policy pursued by the United States from the year 1785 down to the period of Mr. Pierce's Presidentship. Dr. Wheaton, in his "Elements of International Law," states that "the treaty negotiated by Franklin between the United States and Prussia, in 1785, by which it was stipulated that, in case of war, neither power should commission privateers to depredate upon the commerce of the other, furnishes an example worthy of applause and imitation." Franklin, writing at the same time, observes:—"It is high time, for the sake of humanity, to put a stop to this enormity. The United States of America, though better situated than any European nation to make profit by privateering, are, as far as in them lies, endeavoring to abolish the practice." France, in her last war against Spain, having declared that she would grant no commissions to privateers, President Monroe, in his annual message, stated: "This declaration, which appears to have been faithfully carried into effect, concurring with principles proclaimed and cherished by the United States from the first establishment of their Independence, suggested the hope that the time had arrived when the proposal for adopting it as a permanent and invariable rule in all future maritime wars might meet the favorable consideration of the great European Powers. Instructions have accordingly been given to our Ministers with France, Russia, and Great Britain, to make these proposals to their respective governments; and, when the friends of humanity reflect on the essential amelioration of the human race which would result from the abolition of private war on the sea, and on the great facility by which it might be accomplished—requiring the consent of a few sovereigns—an earnest hope is indulged that these overtures will meet with an attentive consideration, animated by the spirit in which they are made, and that they will ultimately be successful." Mr. Adams, the American Secretary of State, writing in 1824 to Mr. Rush, the American Minister at St. James's, uses these remarkable words: "We press no disavowal on her (England), but we think the present time eminently auspicious for urging upon her, and upon others, an object which has long been dear to the hearts, and ardent in the aspirations, of the benevolent and wise; an object essentially congenial to the true spirit of Christianity, and therefore peculiarly fitting for the support of nations intent, in the same spirit, upon the final suppression of the slave trade, and of sovereigns who have given pledges to the world of their determination to administer imperial dominion upon the genuine principles of Christianity. The object to which I allude is the abolition of private war upon the sea."

The same paper (August 23) says, that it is not able nor inclined to dispute Mr. Marcy's statement, that in time of war the strongest maritime nation will be strongest at sea. It thinks that America is rather belligerent, offering war to nations "much oftener than it is pressed upon her;" and then comes out with some statistics as follow:

In the event, however, of such a misfortune to us both as war between us, the practical effect of exempting private ships from capture may be gathered from the following simple facts: The register tonnage of English sailing vessels is about 4,000,000 tons, and steam 300,000. The total of the United States is about the same—very little, however, being steam. To protect this commerce and ruin the enemy's, England, according to the Navy List of July, 1855, had afloat and building 302 sailing vessels with 11,742 guns, and 289 steamers with 5,818 guns, 69,989 horse-power—in all 591 ships with 17,291 guns; and the navy has been considerably increased since that period, being in fact increased daily. This armament is no choice of ours—we would a great deal rather not have it, for it costs us twelve millions a year; it is rendered imperative upon us both by our European necessities, the diffusion of our commerce, and the extent of our Empire. However, there it is, a most powerful instrument in any war, European or not. The American Navy, to protect their own commerce and annihilate ours, consists of 72 vessels, of 2,120 guns, and six steam frigates of 50 guns each, building. We believe some floating batteries also have been recently added; but these would have reference to the defence of their own harbors, not the annoyance of foreign trade. * * *

We do not want a war with America; but we must look upon it as an eventuality not impossible, and we must consider how it is to be carried on; not by land, for there she is unassailable; hardly against her war navy, for with such disproportionate numbers it could do but little mischief. It is in her commerce that she is chiefly vulnerable, and that alike the source of her greatness; and the assurance she gives the rest of the world that she will keep the peace is precisely what Mr. Marcy asks us, in the event of a war, to consider inviolate—that is to say, in case the American Government chooses to quarrel with us, we are to abstain from doing what would be ruinous to the Union—distasteful to every individual of the sovereign people, especially those whose property was captured—and certain to bring the war to a speedy and satisfactory termination; and all this to induce an expiring Cabinet to accept from us the relinquishment of the maritime advantages which are inherent in our maritime superiority.

The Morning Chronicle says the theory laid down by Mr. Marcy in his speech on privateering, is perhaps destined to exercise a most important influence on the future destinies of mankind. It embodies the enunciation of a great principle, entirely in accordance with modern British policy, and generally with the spirit of the age. Mr. Cobden was not so far wrong, at least in principle, when he argued that peace must be the complement of free trade. Although in carrying out that theory, he assumed an attitude ridiculously in advance of public opinion or of the practicable means at the disposal of statesmen, yet it is remarkable what strides have since been made, and in how short a time, towards the accomplishment of his dream.

The claim of America to a diplomatic position independent of the European system may be mere "smartness"—a theory assumed to evade responsibility—or it may sincerely emanate from the peculiar tone of thought prevailing in the Union—a tone of thought fostered by circumstances and institutions. One thing is sure, that if it has its sinister, it also has its bright side. The same independence of custom which enables the American statesman to fling off the incubus of traditional policy, also leads him to adopt a large and liberal tone in dealing with great international questions. It is only another reading of the cry, "America for the Americans," that they should either wholly isolate themselves from European influences, or claim admission only on their own terms. If their demands were made in a mere spirit of arrogance, they would, of course, be instantly rejected, because there are but a few European nations which would not feel quite equal to cope with the Americans, even single handed. But when these new views of policy come in the guise of political philosophy, and aspire to initiate a new international law, founded on the most modern principles of economic science, we are forced to listen to them with respect, and give them their fair amount of weight in our calculations.

The Manchester Guardian considers that America would gain vastly by the movement indicated by Mr. Marcy, and that the security provided for her vast commercial marine would more than compensate for the loss she might sustain by abandoning the right of privateering." Other nations would largely share in the advantages, the Chronicle allows, and rather justly we think, considering what damage the privateers effected.

Letters from Persia mention the appearance of the English flag on the walls of Herat. All accounts agree in the fact, but the Persians have two versions to account for it. According to some, it is the work of the mysterious Englishman who was supposed to have been at Herat at the time when Youssouf Khan was still master there. The Persians were very much puzzled by this man, who was distinguished as a cattle dealer, and asked for his removal, to which, however, the people of Herat opposed themselves. The hoisting of the British flag is now attributed by some to his agency. The other version of the story is, that the people of Herat got a reinforcement of several hundred horsemen from the south, who were seen to enter by the Persian army before Herat. The people of Herat being apprised that this arrival had been seen by the Persians, and greatly magnified on account of the dust which they have raised, took advantage of this to spread the rumor that a large English force had entered Herat, and in confirmation of this they hoisted the English flag.

Advices from Alexandria, dated august 9, say:—Said Pacha, the Viceroy, has just resolved upon running steamers, carrying the Egyptian flag, all round the Red Sea, from Suez to Cossier, Massawah, Aden, Mocha, Jedda, Yambo, and to extend occasionally to Bussorah and Bagdad. The Pacha has requested a number of Europeans to act as directors of the steamers, for this scheme purports to be a company formed by the Pacha, with a capital of £600,000, of which his Highness is to subscribe one-half at once. The Pacha has promised to have docks made at Suez, which if carried out, will prove of great use to our communication with India.

Castleblayney new Roman Catholic Church is fast approaching its completion; it is roofed already, and in the course of some months the outside will be finished. The church is cruciform, consisting of a nave, aisle, and chancel; the style of architecture is pointed Gothic; the building is large and lofty—being 100 feet from the door of the nave to the channel, and 80 feet across the transept, and 50 feet high inside, height of top of cross 70 feet—and will afford ample accommodation for the congregation without galleries. The cost of the structure is somewhere about £2,500. The Protestants and Presbyterians of Castleblayney contributed respectable sums towards the erection.

We find a Kilkenny farmer stating, in reference to the last Monthly Fair in that city, that cattle and sheep exceeded the demand. All stock fit for the butcher sold well. Crops, he writes, are doing well, except so far as the corn has prematurely ripened, by which means the grain will not be either so plump or well-filled, nor the produce of either grain or straw equal to what farmers were led to hope for a month ago. Potatoes are excellent, never so good before for the last twelve years.

The Cork papers are glad to see that the public of their city are beginning to support good management and acting. The pieces, they say, are well put upon the stage, no ugly breaks or gaps offend the eye or the taste of the spectator, and though there may be some small matters connected with the mise en scene which could bear emendation, they think they have not for several years seen plays performed in the city with so much respectability in point of acting.

The Freeman says, that every non-commissioned officer and soldier of the 88th, or Connaught Rangers, who received the decoration of the Legion of Honor, was an Irishman.

Irish News.

Alderman Watson, of Limerick, related a curious anecdote at the Soiree of the Young Men's Society of that city, a few days ago. When he was in London the year of the Great Exhibition, he was invited, he said, by the Lord Mayor, together with the mayors of England, Scotland and Wales, to be present at the opening of the Crystal Palace. He went to the Lord Mayor, whom he accosted and asked for his seat. The reply of the Lord Mayor of London was—"Who are you, sir?" "I am the Mayor of Limerick," said I. "Where is that?" said he. "Somewhere near Plymouth," was my reply. He then informed him that Limerick was a corporate city 110 years before London itself. He then took up his position for the city of Limerick on the right side of the Lord Mayor, taking precedence of the lord mayor of Dublin and the lord mayor of York.

Constable Langan and the constabulary stationed at Lisduogne have made an important seizure. The constable having perceived from the mainland large volumes of smoke on the island of Annagh, in the Lough Koan, suspected that illicit distillation was going on, and determined to attempt a seizure. He and his party divested themselves of a portion of their dress, and waded through the water to the island. On getting there, the parties conducting the distillation had taken to a boat and were fast leaving the island behind them. The constabulary, however, wading back again to the mainland, took a boat they found moored to the shore, and set out in pursuit. The race was maintained for four hours under a scorching sun, before the constabulary succeeded in coming up with the boat. The crew, consisting of two men and a woman, were arrested, and the still and worm, with a large quantity of poteen and pot-ale, were seized. The prisoners have been fined in six pounds each. In default of payment they are sentenced to three months' imprisonment.

The second meeting of the Wexford Archers came off on the 13th of August, at Tykillen House, the elegant seat of Charles Arthur Walker, Esq. The day was rather tempestuous for shooting, still some brilliant scores were made. The first prize was awarded to Miss Nannie Percival. The second was adjudged to Mrs. David Beatty. The third prize to Miss Sarah Percival. After shooting the company assembled, about 160 in number, and dined together in their marquee. The various scores were now announced, the prizes were presented to the victors and their healths proposed. The saloons and halls of Tykillen were then thrown open, and dancing commenced to Hanlon's unrivalled band. The attention of Mr. and Mrs. Walker to their guests was unbounded. The prizes were furnished from the Atelier of Mr. Asken, of Sackville-street, Dublin, who has for several years supplied the Wexford Archers.

Sir Charles Wood and Admiral Berkely, Lords of the Admiralty, have visited the new graving dock, which is being constructed at the North Wall, Dublin. Their Lordships arrived in one of the Vice-regal carriages, and were accompanied by Colonel Larcom, Under-Secretary. Their lordships minutely examined the dock, which were explained to them by Mr. Halonn, chief-engineer, and by Mr. Stoney, assistant-engineer, and expressed themselves highly pleased with the manner in which those splendid works are being executed.

A very handsome barque called the Spitfire has been launched from the building yard of Messrs. George Robinson & Co., Water street, Cork, The framing is of the best oak plank, and the beams are of iron. She is chartered to convey railway carriages to Rio. The vessel is copper sheathed, and when she was launched all her spars were aloft and a portion of her sails bent. The ceremony of naming was performed by Lady Benson. The Messrs. Robinson are now building a screw-steamer for Messrs. Malcomson, of Portlaw, Co. Waterford.

A letter from Clonmel repeats the story that the fugitive member for Tipperary was lately seen near Coolnamuck, and had successfully evaded the pursuit of the police. It is added that it was early last month he left Clonacoody, when the mansion was taken possession of by Captain Kellett, to whom the place originally belonged. The monster indictment against Sadleir, which is now lying at the Crown office in Clonmel, covers half a dozen of skins of parchment.

An inquest has been held on the body of Thomas Pope, Kilcash, Co. Tipperary. Three weeks ago, a horse of his died. Since then he has been laboring under the idea that he was about losing everything he had. The night of his death he was very low spirited, and remained pacing up and down the room for some time after his wife had gone to bed. She fell asleep, and on awaking about twelve o'clock, she sent her son to call his father, who, on proceeding to the stable found him suspended by the neck from a beam. The jury returned a verdict in accordance with the facts.

Whenever a packet station is established, the Limerick Chronicle insists, between Ireland and America, Foyne's Island must be the place. The commissioners appointed by Government to report on that subject have decided in favor of Foynes. The railway will be completed from Foynes to Limerick within another year, and passengers landing at Foynes could readily reach London within fifteen or sixteen hours, via Waterford and Milford.

A contract has been entered into for the erection of the new Catholic Church in Tramore, with Messrs. Ryan & Son, of Limerick, for the sum of £5,312. They have built the Model School of Limerick, and the Thomastown Workhouse. The Lismore bridge is also taken by Limerick men.

We are pleasantly informed by the Waterford News that for some days past the stray dogs and cats of the town have been prowling about the barracks, there being no soldiers to occupy them. One old towzer, the News observes, on three legs, has been doing duty apparently at the artillery barrack.

The Mayor of Wexford has received a letter from the Commissioners of Education stating that they have resolved upon the establishment of Model Schools for the Wexford district in the town of Enniscorthy.

The occasion of the visit of the Lords of the Admiralty to Kingstown was taken advantage of by the military authorities, to afford these distinguished visitors the gratification of witnessing a review of the Crimean regiments now in Dublin.

The Rev. Dominick Noon, P. P., Geevagh, has returned from Palmerston Glebe, where he has been on a visit for some days with the Rev. Malachy Brenan, P.P. Ahamlish.

From the Clonmel Chronicle we learn that the mayor of that town has received a letter from the Horse Guards, stating that for the present Clonmel cannot be selected as the centre of a military district.

In 1848 Mr. Lamie Murray presented himself as a candidate for the representation of Waterford. In March, 1839, he obtained a loan of £1,000 sterling from Dr. Elliotson, London, and gave him a bill for it. Subsequently Mr. Murray took up his residence in Paris, and paid a portion of the amount, together with interest on the whole sum up to 1848, since which time he has paid nothing. On the 8th of June, 1855, a French gentleman, named Josseaume, notified Mr. Murray that the biil had been formally transferred to him by Dr. Elliottson, and obtained from one of the courts authorization to make a provisional seizure of Mr. Murray's furniture as a security for the payment. Mr. Murray took proceedings to have the seizure set aside. The tribunal, after hearing what he and Josseaume had to say, decided that as the debt owing by Murray had been contracted in England, and to an Englishman, and as the bill in question had not been indorsed to Josseaume in the regular course of business, but transferred to him long after it had become due, he could not, according to French law, proceed against Mr. Murray in a French court, and that, consequently, the seizure of the furniture was void. On Thursday Mr. Josseaume appealed to the Imperial Court, but the decision was affirmed.

The half-yearly statement of the London and County Bank shows that the entire advances from that institution to John Sadleir were £111,000, which sum is said to be fully covered by securities, from which it is expected a surplus will be available for his general creditors. Administration of Sadleir's property has been granted to Mr. Anthony Norris, of Bedford-row, in trust for the creditors, with the consent of the crown, to whom it had been estreated. Mr. James Sadleir's furniture at Clonacody has been seized, and is now stored in Clonmel, previous to sale, the proceeds to be appropriated to the benefit of the estate.

We learn from the Limerick Reporter that harvest operations have become general. Laborers are in earnest request. Before daylight crowds of them wend their way through the streets of Limerick, to the music of pipes and fifes, and amid cheering and huzzaing, to the rural districts to cut the harvest. Wages are exceedingly high. Three and six pence per diem, with food, is demanded; and in very many instances, this sum, equal to the American dollar, is given. The bulk of the laborers are from the West of Clare, Galway and Kerry. They appear to be better clad than for some previous years.

The Excursion Train on the Limerick and Foynes Railway, three weeks since, was the largest which left Limerick since the opening of the line. Thirteen carriages were filled. The greater number of Excursionists went to Adare. Many also came from Rathkeale. Twenty carriages were lying at the Rathkeale Terminus during the day, all of which were crowded with passengers, returning in the evening to the city.

The Wexford Independent gives an extract under the heading, "The Harvest" from a lengthy return made in the Agicultural Gazette, comprising England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The report from Wexford is made by a gentleman well known as an eminent agriculturist, fully versed in its science and theories, Mr. G. Gordon, Gorey. His Report is—"Wheat, very good; Barley, middling; Peas, none; Green-crops, bad."

The marble altar, in the Byzantine style, executed by Mr. Kirwan, of Bolton-street, Dublin, for Sir Thomas Esmonde, for the parish church of Gorey, is one of the most exquisite specimens of that style of art seen produced by Irish skill. The solid part of the altar appears as a square sarcophagus of richly veined green marble, surrounded by a Byzantine colonnade of of costly Sienna marble, with capitals of white marble. As there is no tabernacle, its place is occupied by a cubic mass of white statuary marble that serves as the pedestal for the crucifix.

A brilliant report of a concert appears in the Waterford News. Since the visit of Catherine Hayes, the citizens of Waterford have not witnessed such an assemblage. The programme presented a feast of musical gems, the performance of which was listened to with intense interest. Nothing could exceed the taste and beauty with which Mr. Keating delivered his songs, and Captain Palliser's splendid basso was never heard to greater advantage. Mr. Coghlan's pianoforte duetts, with Captain Power's violin accompaniment, were given with much effect. Dr. O'Rorke acted as conductor.

At a recent meeting of the Belfast Board of Guardians, a conversation having arisen as to the giving of money to paupers by their friends when visiting them, it was decided that a notice should be put up, informing visitors that money, or tobacco, or any other prohibited article, given to the paupers would be taken from them, and that the inmates should be immediately searched after holding an interview with any of their friends.

Dr. Cahill, in the Dublin Telegraph, says, that the late French movement in reference to Spain is a symptom of French feeling and French diplomacy; it is an expression of a power which can subdue English bigotry; it is, if you will, an attitude which raises up Catholicity, and menaces Souperism throughout Europe.

Mr. Richard Hunt, who has for the past year gratuitously performed the duties of Petty Sessions Clerk at Tramore, has been elected to that office by the bench, in room of the late clerk.

From the Waterford papers we are exceedingly gratified to learn, that laborers are getting, in this neighborhood, 2s. 6d. per day with diet, and 3s. 6d. without it. Laborers are very scarce in the neighborhood.

The Right Rev. Dr. O'Brien, accompanied by the Rev. E. O'Donnell, P. P., Tallow, has arrived in Waterford from the Continent. His Lordship, on the festival of the Assumption, presided at Grand High Mass in the Cathedral.

The 94th regiment under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Dennis, have received the route for the Curragh camp. The 94th conducted themselves well while stationed at Nenagh. It is reported that they will be replaced by the 60th Rifles, Second Battalion.

There has been a great demand for harvest laborers in Clonmel notwithstanding the broken weather. Smart hands were readily engaged at 2s. per day, and women for binding, were hired at 1s. each.

A private of the Tipperary Light Infantry, of the name of Sullivan, who had been under arrest for mutiny, died in the jail of Nenagh. He was interred in St. Mary's Church-yard, attended to his last home by all the men of the regiment.

Edmund Leary, servant to a farmer named Looby, was drowned while bathing in the river Suir, at Ballydine, near Carrick, three weeks ago.

Mr. Michael Gaul's bacon concern, is the only establishment of the kind now unlet in Waterford.

The following letter from a correspondent of the Waterford Chronicle deserves insertion, and will attract attention: "The verdant bosom of the poor 'Emerald Isle' groans now with almost a mature and luxuriant crop of all cereal herbage. The genial and nearly tropical sun of the past week has brought to-day, and then to-morrow, corn under the sickle that only a few days ago could not be thought fit for cutting for weeks to come; and the athletic, brave, and lively Irish reaper, with his melodious whistle, is, with few exceptions, seen in all the cornfields in this locality. The thing mostly talked of wherever you go here, is the excessive heat of these days. I am out since Monday, and each stream, river or water I saw or passed was inundated with men, women, and children, splashing like ducks in the water. They find no other retreat or refuge from the broiling heat during the day. I passed the river Mahon, below Kilmacthomas, before I could discover daylight on yesterday morning, and at that early hour several were paddling and bathing in the dark and mountain water of that romantic river. At night the people have to leave the front and rear doors of their dwellings quite open, a servant or a member of the family up to protect the property. Many have deserted their beds, as I have done myself, and sleep on a clean table in the most open and largest apartment of the house. Labor in some places has been suspended during the greater part of the day, resuming the work late in the evening. Bonmahon was on last Sunday and Monday besieged with strangers taking the water, and, as they say, 'If the sea were beer, they would drink it dry.'"

Lieutenant Charles Henry Browne, of the 97th Regiment of Foot, has returned to his father's house, county Carlow, after enduring all the fatigue and privations of the Russian war. Along his entire route home were triumphal arches, and banners fluttered from every available position. In the evening, Browne's Hill was the scene of the most enlivening festivity. Music and dancing were kept up till a late hour, the gallant gentleman and other members of the family cheering the dancers by their presence. After this a large bonfire was lighted, and at the conclusion there was a display of fireworks, under the superintendence of Mr. Vaux. A deputation waited on the gallant young gentleman, at Browne's Hill, with an address signed by all the inhabitants of the town.

In the town of Tuam, on the day selected for bringing home the turf of the Rev. Mr. Conway, R.C.C., the parishioners, between eighty and ninety in number, assembled at a bog, about four miles from the town, and took in their share of the freight. On entering the town the horses and carts were decorated with green branches, the foremost having musicians playing national airs. A sumptuous feast was prepared for them on the beautiful lawn in front of St. Mary's, but so eager were they for the safety of their charge, that the people would not partake of it until the turf was all clamped and secured. After that they enjoyed themselves in good old Irish fashion.

The ceremonial of laying the foundation stone of the Magee College recently took place in Londonderry, in presence of the governor and members of the Hon. the Irish Society and a large body of respectable gentlemen, representing the town council and the different professions of the city. The site of the college is a beautiful rising ground, immediately above Lough Foyle, on the left side of the road leading from the city, and it commands a grand view of the Lough, the Derry Railway, and other interesting scenery. The Rev. Dr. Brown, of Aghadowey, made a statement, on behalf of the trustees, in reference to the history of the college, and the intentions of the trustees in respect to it. Alderman Humphrey, the governor of the Irish Society, then laid the foundation stone.

At the last assizes at Ennis several men, women and children were tried and convicted for a riot and assault upon a scripture reader, named Denny, at Kilrush. Colonel Vandeleur, several of the grand jury, the petty jury, and gentry in the neighborhood of Kilrush petitioned his Excellency for a remission of the sentence. His Excellency being of opinion that the law had been amply vindicated by the punishment already suffered by these parties, was pleased to remit the remainder of their sentence.

The profession of three young ladies for the Loretto Convent, took place lately in the Cathedral Church of Letterkenny. The Right Rev. Dr. McGettigan officiated. The Loretto Convent at Letterkenny, is the younger sister of the many fine institutions of a similar character, founded by Mrs. Ball, of Rathfarnham, sister to Judge Ball, whose taste and zeal are so conspicuous in the beautiful edifices at Bray, Clontarf, Gorey, Dalkey, and Rathfainham.

Drafts of soldiers are proceeding to Nenagh pending the sentence agreed to by Court Martial. Rumor has it that some of the men found guilty will be severely dealt with. All the arms of the Tipperary regiment have been sent to Dublin. What the object is, except the disbandment altogether of the North Tipperary, no one can conjecture. The Limerick Reporter says it is generally believed that government regrets ever having called out the militia.

John Ward, late of Ramelton, county Donegal, previously of Doby's lane, Glasgow, Scotland, manufacturing chemist; Wm. M'Cracken, late of Londonderry, previously of Ballymena, surgeon and druggist, formerly of Ballymoney, not in any business; Patrick Doherty, late of Roseville-street, Londonderry, shopkeeper, have been declared insolvent debtors.

The Dublin militia have left Waterford for Dublin, there to be disbanded. Though some of the Dublin boys, the Waterford News says, were a little jolly, particularly in their cups, still they were honest, good-hearted Irishmen; hardy, iron-framed fellows, able, if called on, for any kind of duty.

In a mood of self complacency quite wondrous to witness, the Northern Whig has reached the very summit of folly. It has opened a subscription for the relief of the King of Sardinia! Such, says the Ulsterman, is the latest craze of our eccentric cotemporary.

At a meeting held in the Court-house, Drogheda, presided over by the Mayor, approval was expressed of an application made by the Corporation to the Lords of the Treasury for leave to borrow £5,000 for the erection of two drawbridges over the Boyne, and a resolution was passed thanking the Boyne Commissioners for the sum of £2,000 towards carrying out the work.

The Rev. Dean O'Loughlin, of the Irish College, Paris, is enjoying the hospitality of his brother-in-law, Bryan M'Swiney, Esq., Kinsale. The Rev. gentleman has derived much benefit from the air of his native country.

An effort is now made to enlarge Dunmore Protestant church to accommodate the large number of visitors during the summer months.

Cork has contributed over three hundred pounds to the French inundation fund.

The report of the directors of the Londonderry and Enniskillen Railway Company states that the traffic for the half-year ending the 30th of June last amounted to £16,105, an average of £619 per week; and for the corresponding period of 1855 to £14,366, averaging £552 per week, showing an increase of £67 per week, or 12 per cent. The working expenses for the past half-year amounted to £8,790, against £10,753 for the corresponding period of 1855, showing a decrease of £1,783, or £68 per week. The improvement in the nett receipts amount to £3,532, as compared with the corresponding period of 1855. There remains a disposable balance of £9,555, which is sufficient to give 2s. 6d. a share on the original preference shares, being at the rate of 2 per cent per annum.

The obsequies of the Bishop of Wexford, the Right Rev. Dr. Murphy, took place in the Cathedral of Enniscorthy, amid the tears of thousands of his people, and upwards of one hundred members of the Priesthood. The Archbishop of Dublin, and the Lord Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin—the Right Rev. Dr. Walsh were present. The Pontifical Mass, was celebrated by the former. Before the clergy separated the venerable Dean of the Diocese, the Very Rev. P. Murphy P.P. Glynn, was unanimously appointed Vicar Capitular to administer the affairs of the Diocese until a successor to the See be installed.

Professor Glukman, who first introduced photography into Ireland, and who has ever since retained his position at the head of the profession in Dublin, has recently introduced an improvement in this interesting art, which places him still further in advance of his numerous competitors. It is an improved style of photographic portraits. The extreme skill and taste with which these delicate processes are executed constitute the great merit of Mr. Glukman's portraits. He calls them "mezzotinto photographs," because of their resemblance to the mezzotinto engraving, the finest specimens of which they rival in distinctness and delicacy of outline, and in the softness and beauty of their shadowing.

The ships of war Wellington, Conqueror, the gun-boat, and the Admiralty yacht, Osborne, have returned to Queenstown, having cruised westward to Bantry Bay. Various rumors are afloat as to government measures with regard to Queenstown; one, that it is to be made a permanent naval station; another, that a gridiron for the repair of Her Majesty's vessels is to be placed at Haulbowline, which island is to be devoted exclusively to naval purposes. The Ordnance Department is to be removed to the military barracks at Queenstown.

Miss Kearney of Ballymoon, Co. Carlow, received the black veil from the hands of the Right Rev. Dr. Walsh, Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin. Two years have scarcely elapsed since the arrival of the Presentation Nuns in Portarlington was hailed with joy by the inhabitants of that town. In that brief period they have erected splendid schools where hundreds of poor female children gratuitously receive an excellent education.

Ballybricken, the Acropolis of Waterford, is still in the dark. The News says, the Corporation ought to come to some arrangement about placing even a few gas-lights in there. When Ross, Enniscorthy, Lismore, and other small towns, are lighted in every part, it is not creditable, says the News, to see so populous and industrious a locality as Ballybricken without a glimmer of light.

A young man from Nenagh, named William Cane, who had been two years in the police force, at the breaking out of the war joined the Commissariat Department in the Crimea, and speedily attained the rank of Quarter Master Sergeant in that corps, has just returned home. He has received a medal and clasp.

The annual cattle show of the Killultagh and Derryvolgie Farming Society was recently held in the Grain Market, Lisburn. Compared to the shows of former years, it was an improvement, especially as regarded black cattle and horses. Some of the colts were remarkably fine. In the evening the annual dinner came off in the Conservative Reading-room. About eighty persons sat down.

The Kilkenny Journal says that the exertions of the managers of the Waterford and Kilkenny Railway, for the entertainment of the public are beyond all praise. Fancy traveling from Kilkenny to Waterford for one shilling, and from Kilkenny to Limerick for four shillings!

The officers of the Wexford Regiment entertained at a farewell dinner, a large number of their friends, including the officers of the Wicklow Rifles, staying at Tykillen, Sir James Power, Bart., Mr. Talbot, D. L., and Mr. Beatty.

Thirty-nine parishes in the county Wexford have contributed for the relief of the French sufferers by the inundations.

PARAGRAPHS FROM THE DUBLIN PAPERS.

Mr, John O'Connell is provided for at last. He succeeds his brother-in-law, Christopher Fitzsimon, as Clerk of the Hanaper office. The situation is worth $11,000 a year. The appointment meets with the approval of all the old parties—Orange included. A complimentary notice appears in the Evening Mail, in which the fitness of the patriotic gentleman is gracefully acknowledged.

Jam redit et Virgo, redeunt Saturnia regna.

Apollo reigns. John O'Connell, if not consul, as Virgil's Pollio was, is Clerk of the Hanaper, and summer days—days brighter and sweeter than those sung of by the Sicilian Muses—now dawn for Ireland.

"Ille Deum vitam accipiet, Divesque videbit
Permixtos heroas, et ipse videbitur illis;
Pacatumque reget patris virtutibus orbem."

Let us be glad he is to sit out life from henceforth on velvet cushions. For all his sacrifices in the cause of Ireland, he deserves this compensation.

Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori.

It's decent and pleasant to die on the floor of the House.

Thomas Mooney (compiler of fourteen pounds weight of Irish history) draws his pen from Conlop's hotel, Melbourne, in defence of Robert Tyler, that excellent gentleman having been attacked in a very butcherly style by the Melbourne Herald. It is announced that "a ruffian named Tyler boasted he had organized a conspiracy, ramified through twenty-two States, for the invasion and emancipation of Ireland." The ponderous historian of Ireland says:—

"Probably, sir, you are not aware that Mr. Tyler is the son of one of the most respected ex-Presidents of the United States; that he was for some years the Private Secretary of State to his father's administration; that he is a distinguished scholar, statesman and jurist, and is moreover among the most polished gentlemen of the American republic, one who will probably yet be the chosen President over the affairs of thirty millions of the most intelligent and most powerful people on the earth.

"If to desire the "emancipation of Ireland," and to labor for that end and lose fortune, wealth and station—to peril life if necessary to accomplish that object, be in your eyes deserving the name of 'ruffian,' I have no hesitation to class myself under this new order of political merit, which you have the honor of establishing in this part of the terrestrial globe—this newest of new worlds, whereon you say a future empire of great hope for the oppressed is to be established.

"You may, perhaps, be glad to be informed that there are many thousand such 'ruffians' in this part of the world; and hoping most sincerely that you yourself may be of the new order soon,

I remain, sir, your reader and friend,
THOMAS MOONEY."

Mooney is as spunky as the burghers of Liege. Their petition to the Dutch King being declared "infamous," they resolved themselves on the spot into the "Order of Infamy," adopting as their motto—"Fideles jusqu'à l'infamie."

The question of the Church Temporalities is again before the public. There's no keeping down that monstrous nuisance. 'Twill come to the surface and float there, despite the ingenuity of the Government to keep it quietly below. So much the better. It must rot and fall to pieces in the sunshine. To hasten this desirable dissolution, there's been an immense meeting in Clonakilty, county Cork. It took place the 15th of last month. From twelve to fifteen thousand people were present. O'Neil Daunt delivered a powerful speech. During his long silence (he has scarcely opened his lips since '48,) he seems to have accumulated fresh substance and vigor. He drives his points home with a thundering effect. Here is a passage worth sprinkling with gold dust:

"We come next to the speech of Mr. Hamilton, who takes high ground. He defends the Church Establishment, because, he says, it is the duty of a Christian state to adopt a definite form of religious worship. Now, this is actually making the State, and not the Bible, the arbiter of faith, and the judge of what species of religious worship should be adopted. And when Mr. Hamilton entrusts to the state this delicate and important task, does he ever consider the incongruous materials of which the state, in its theological capacity, is composed? There is my Lord Palmerston, the Pelagian, who does not believe in original sin. There is Lord Panmure, the Presbyterian and Freekirker, who hates Popery with infinite cordiality. There is Monsell, the Roman Catholic, who doubtless reciprocates Lord Panmure's theological prejudices. There is Fox, the Unitarian. There is the Archbishop of Canterbury, who patronizes Mr. Gorham. There is the Bishop of Exeter, who hunted Gorman out of his diocese for his heresies. There is, or lately was, Lord Ellenborough, who truckled to pagan idolatry at Somnauth."

This reminds us of the style in which Shiel used to dig into the silk aprons and crush the mitres of the Protestant bishops, and all the other superfluities of the Established Church. With what a ringing voice he used to cry out, his beautiful black eye fiercely flashing and his whole frame convulsed—"Had St. Paul ten thousand a year? Had the teachers of the Gospel two millions of green acres in Palestine?" Describing a dream he had of the early Christian days—"I beheld," he said, "no mitres upon the chariots in which the apostles journeyed from Jerusalem to Rome. I saw no Bench of Bishops in the Senate. I saw no Mining Company in surplices digging under the rocks of Calvary for gold."

Had Shiel been true to this question, some fragment of this huge robbery of the poor might have been long since dislodged. It is the acquiesence of such men which keeps the monstrous pile together.

The agitation about the out-side cars has quieted down. The Nation informs us that the Police Commissioners are defeated. The whole story is told in a few words. It's a pity to lose a syllable of it. The Nation says—

"All is over. The Police Commissioners are defeated. Lord Carlisle has surrendered, and the brave car-drivers are at last relieved from their elevated and dangerous positions. It is astonishing how men and horses lived so long under the 45th bye-law. Worthy citizens, male and female, have been pitched upon the curb stones at the angles of every street in Dublin, and meetings have been held in the Music Hall without effect. The Commissioners continued to believe that from the box seat the driver could best control his horse and see before both wheels of the car. But what will not perseverance do? The carmen jolted the public and petitioned the Lord Lieutenant. The prayer was refused. They jolted and petitioned again, and held another meeting in the Music Hall; at length they succeeded."

But Alderman Reynolds has no sooner won one victory, than he rushes forward for another. A meeting has been held in the Oak-room of the Mansion-house, Dawson street, Dublin. The object of it was to make preparations for a great banquet to the Crimean soldiers now stationed in Ireland. The Lord Mayor presided. Judge Keogh was close to one of his Lordship's elbows, and Alderman Reynolds rubbed himself against the other. Isaac Butt was present. So was Sir Timothy O'Brien, Colonel Browne of the Police, Martin Burke of the Shelburne, and other metropolitan celebrities. The Lord Lieutenant, in a letter addressed to the Lord Mayor by his Excellency, cordially approves of the object. He writes:

"So many demonstrations are being made in London and elsewhere in honor of the regiments who have assisted in the late war, that it seems to me that the capital of Ireland ought not to be wholly inactive upon the occasion, especially after Irishmen have borne so distinguished a part in the late conflicts."

The following resolution was clamorously adopted by the meeting. Moved by Mr. Butt, it was seconded by Alderman Reynolds:

"That steps should be taken to give a national entertainment in the city of Dublin to the troops who have served in the Crimea."

They propose to raise five or six thousand pounds for the purpose.

The appointment of Captain O'Connell to the Hanaper Office, leaves the representation of Clonmel vacant. There's a rush for it. Carew O'Dwyer, a spavined old hack, is once more on the course. Two or three other antiquities follow his hoofs. Even Somers is mentioned. But the candidate likely to win is a sleek cunning young nag, John Patrick Murray by name. He shows every sort of color, from the bright green of Repeal down to the pink of the Treasury. He is backed by Dean Burke, who generally walks clean over the course with his favorite, though the effect of his fall from the dome of St. Peter's (a few summers ago) is still pretty evident.

Mr. John Patrick Murray is the reputed editor of the Irish Quarterly Review. That the virtuous young gentleman will ever become an ornament of the Commons, his warmest friend is not infatuated enough to suppose. A dry sapless twig, without a blossom or a leaf, or even the promise of a bud, he will answer remarkably well for one of those respectable mutes who gregariously vote at the nod of the Premier. No one we know of is better qualified to take the seat which Captain O'Connell has left cold in the Commons.

Thomas Lee, the Irish Comedian, is dead. He was for many years a member of Covent Garden and Drury Lane Theatres.

No reply to the application for mercy has as yet been received from the Crown, in the case of Curley, the Nenagh Militia-man, found guilty of murder for shooting a soldier of the line. Fears are entertained that the reply will be unfavorable.

The result of the recent examination of candidates for commissions in the Royal Artillery, and for admission to the Military Academy of Woolwich, reflects the most brilliant credit on the Dublin University and other Irish collegiate establishments. Out of some forty competitors at large, eleven were from Trinity College, one from the Queen's College, Belfast, and one from the Catholic University. Of the applicants for admission to the Military Academy, four were Trinity Collegians.

The Evening Packet congratulates Ireland eloquently and exultingly upon the event.

From the Evening Post we learn that the Lord Lieutenant insists that the original ordinance of the Order of St. Patrick, requiring the robes of the Knights to be of Irish manufacture, shall henceforward be strictly adhered to. From this out the Knights, whenever they appear in chapter or on any public occasion, will have to wear robes of Irish poplin.

The Freeman's Journal promises an interesting and exciting scene on the occasion of the new regimental colors being presented to the 18th Royal Irish by his Excellency the Earl of Carlisle. The old colors are to be conveyed to St. Patrick's Cathedral, where they will be so placed as to overshadow the monuments raised by the officers and men of this gallant Regiment to the memory of their comrades who fell in the Burmese and Chinese wars. The window between these monuments will be filled with a magnificent design in painted glass, exhibiting some of the most thrilling events of the Crimean campaign.

Beyond these items, nothing very striking is to be found in the Dublin papers. The grains of gold are few, indeed, in that dull waste of lead.

From the Dublin Freeman.

IRISH SOLDIERS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE.

SERGEANT BROPHY OF THE 63D.

Instances of chivalrous bravery by Irish soldiers throughout the war have been current in the army. They have been more distinguished for brilliant feats than either the English or Scotch soldiers. The list of the Legion of Honor testifies to this noble daring, for one-half of the decore are unmistakeably Irishmen, though the War Office returns represent our countrymen as constituting less than 30 per cent. of the British army. On a late occasion, Sir Harry Smith—himself a renowned soldier, who won Aliwal by one of those splendid movements which went to the heart of Sir Charles Napier—presented new colors to the 25th Regiment at Manchester. Alluding to the tenacity with which the true soldier always defends the colors of his regiment, Sir Harry referred to the bravery of a sergeant of the 63d, whose name, however, he stated incorrectly. That gallant soldier was an Irishman, and his name the good old one of Brophy. When the struggle was hottest at Inkermann, the ensign who bore the colors of the 63d was struck down. Brophy, who happened to be close to his officer, seized the colors and rushed forward, calling on his comrades to follow. They answered the call, though the odds against them were many to one, and after a vain attempt to disperse with the bayonet the compact Russian column, they fell back, leaving Brophy wounded on the field. Though the regiment yielded, and the intrepid sergeant was severely hit, he stoutly held the color. When the 63d by a flank movement regained its former position on the heights, Brophy was found, bleeding and exhausted, with his darling color in his breast. His valor was recognized by his superior officers. Honorable mention was made of his conduct in the despatches to the Minister of War.

From Napier's Peninsular War.

PRIVATES PIGOT, STEWART, AND M'QUADE, OF THE 43D.

Here some illustrations of the intelligence and the lofty spirit of British soldiers will not be misplaced. When the last of the retreating troops had passed the bridge, an Irishman of the 43d, named Pigot, a bold, turbulent fellow, leaned on his firelock, regarded the advancing enemy for some time, and then, in the author's hearing, thus delivered his opinion of the action: "General Craufrod wanted glory, so he stopped on the wrong side of the river, and now he is knocked over to the right side. The French general won't be content until his men try to get on the wrong side also, and then they will be knocked back. Well! both will claim a victory, which is neither here nor there, but just in the middle of the river. That's glory!" Then, firing his musket, he fell into the ranks. Even to the letter was his prediction verified, for General Craufurd published a contradiction of Massena's dispatch. The sarcasm was enforced by one of a tragic nature. There was a fellow-soldier to Pigot, a north of Ireland man named Stewart, but jocularly called the Boy because of his youth, nineteen, and his gigantic stature and strength. He had fought bravely, and displayed great intelligence beyond the river, and was one of the last men who came down to the bridge, but he would not pass. Turning round, he regarded the French with a grim look, and spoke aloud as follows: "So! this is the end of our boasting. This is our first battle, and we retreat! The Boy Stewart will not live to hear that said." Then striding forward with his giant might, he fell furiously on the nearest enemies with the bayonet, refused the quarter they seemed desirous of granting, and died fighting in the midst of them. Still more touching, more noble, more heroic was the death of Sergeant Robert M'Quade. During M'Leod's rush, this man, also from the north of Ireland, saw two Frenchmen level their muskets on rests against a high gap in a bank awaiting the uprise of an enemy; the present Adjutant-General Brown (Sir George), then a lad of sixteen, attempted to ascend at the fatal point; M'Quade, himself only twenty-four years of age, pulled him back, saying, with a calm, decided tone, "You are too young, sir, to be killed; and then, offering his own person to the fire, fell dead, pierced with two balls!"

IRISH SOLDIERS AT HOME.

From the Dublin Freeman's Journal.

Whatever may be the opinion entertained of the management of the war, upon one point, at least, there can be no doubt or cavil—that the soldiers composing the force known as "the British Army" deserve well of their Sovereign and of their country. If Generals have blundered, the soldiers have never been wanting. Whatever errors may have characterized the acts of the military chiefs, or of the heads of the commissariat—though, in our opinion, there has been much superficial criticism expended on these topics, and too little allowance made for the inevitable chances and casualties of war—the press and the public have been unanimous in their admiration of the brilliant gallantry and heroic fortitude of the troops. Never in the annals of warfare—not even when years of arduous campaigning had given the Duke of Wellington a veteran and disciplined force, with which he declared he could go any where and do anything—have our troops displayed in bolder relief those qualities of courage, strength, and endurance which have won them the reputation of the best soldiers in the world. It is natural, therefore, and it is right, that at the triumphant termination of the war, the people of England should welcome with enthusiasm the brave men who have so nobly sustained their military renown. Every regiment that has returned from the Crimea has received a hearty and cordial welcome in England, and in several instances municipal hospitalities have been proffered to them. A few days ago the gallant Scots Greys, officers and men, were splendidly entertained at Coventry; and a short time previously the not less gallant Fourth Royal Irish Dragoons were feted by the people of Sheffield. The Guards have received a regular ovation. Their entry into London was made a great public event, arranged by Government, discussed by Parliament, sanctioned by the presence of Royalty. Further honors still await them. Upon an early day the Londoners will entertain the three regiments of Household troops at a grand banquet at the Surrey Gardens, and it is understood that the Queen has taken an active part in promoting this compliment to her favorite troops. Scotland has not been backward in claiming her share of the triumph, and glorifying the valor of Scottish soldiers. "The Land o' Cakes" has rung with acclamations in honor of the Highland Brigade, of which all Scotchmen are justly proud. There has not been, we believe, any public entry of troops, but at the banquet to Sir Colin Campbell, which was attended by some of the most distinguished men in Scotland, the warlike prowess of Scotchmen and the deeds of the Highland Brigade were fertile themes of eulogy. But while England and Scotland have been thus welcoming back their heroes, Ireland has remained silent and apathetic. From this country no voice of welcome or congratulation has gone forth as Irish soldiers, weather-beaten and exhausted by wounds and hardships have again touched their native soil. At least, if any indications of such a feeling have been manifested, they were purely local, and never assumed the magnitude and importance of a national demonstration. That this apparent apathy belies the real feelings of the people we have no doubt. We know that Irishmen of all ranks and classes—of every section of political opinion—sympathised warmly with their countrymen in the Crimea, and felt their hearts thrill at every new proof that the famous old regiments with which so many heroic recollections are associated—the 18th, the 33d, and the glorious Connaught Rangers, who have reaped more brilliant laurels on more hotly contested fields than any other regiment in the world—were nobly sustaining their ancient fame in the desperate encounters that marked the Crimean war. We are satisfied that the sentiments of admiration and affection entertained by their countrymen towards the Irish regiments are deep and wide-spread, and that it is but necessary to make a beginning—to initiate some movement in their honor, in order to elicit an enthusiastic response from the whole Irish nation. Such a demonstration would partake of no sectarian or party character, and would therefore enlist the sympathies and support of all classes. It would be simply a recognition by the Irish people of the Irish valor which was so conspicuously displayed in the Crimea on so many memorable occasions—and never, we believe, was that valor more worthy of recognition and applause. We are not afraid of being accused of national vanity when we say that it would be impossible to exaggerate the importance of the services rendered by the Irish troops, or to overrate the individual bravery by which they were distinguished. The Irish regiments, strictly so called, and composed exclusively of Irishmen, were more constantly employed in trench work and in hard fighting than any other part of the army. The 88th (our authority for this fact is the Times) suffered more than any other regiment during the war, because it was more constantly and more hotly engaged; and the 33d suffered in almost an equal proportion. On the other hand, it is notorious that the remaining regiments of the line, nominally English, were mainly composed of Irishmen. The returns of the 41st, 46th, 49th, 50th, 55th, 63d, and many others will convince the most sceptical on this point.

It appears, even from an official document published by the late Commander-in-Chief, that one of the most exclusively national regiments in the service, the 23d Welsh Fusileers, contained Irish soldiers in the proportion of one-seventh of the entire force. We believe there is no indisposition on the part of the English people—in the main a generous race, truth loving and fond of fair play—to do us justice in this respect, but it is otherwise with the English press. The leading journals which have always been so prompt to denounce what they call "Irish crime," and rail at "Irish indolence," and which even now rarely lose an opportunity of indulging in a sneer at our expense, took good care to slur over the services of the Irish soldiers. They were invariably classed under the generic term "British soldiers"—their separate nationality was never alluded to; but, on the other hand, the press teemed with special laudations of the Guards and Highlanders as such, or in other words of the English and the Scotch. The only reference to the part which Ireland had taken in the past struggle that we remember to have seen in the leading columns of the Times was a vague allusion to the "stubborn courage of the Highlands and of Connaught." This silence of the English press is an additional reason why Irish journals should dwell upon the achievements of their countrymen. We have often directed attention to those sad lists of the killed and wounded, in which the number of Irish names proved how much the reputation of England depended on Irish arms. In fact, had the Irish soldiers been deducted, England would have had no army worthy of the name; and if their places had to be supplied out of the rural or manufacturing districts of England, our wealthy neighbors would have felt the pressure of war with a severity that would have taxed to the uttermost their patriotism and their fortitude. But it is not alone the vast number of Irishmen who fought and bled that should give to the people of this country an interest in the records of the late struggle. Irishmen were remarkable not merely for their courage, but for the high spirit, cheerful endurance, quick intelligence and fertility of resource in moments of surprise and difficulty, which are characteristic of the Celtic race. The men selected for special praise in the divisional orders on account of some signal act of valor or presence of mind, were, for the most part, Irishmen. Sergeant Sulivan was the first non-commissioned officer honored with notice in a General's despatch, and in the recent distribution of the Legion of Honor by the Emperor of the French, we find the same preponderance of Irish names among the rank and file.

We have been led to make these observations by an excellent letter from a correspondent, which appears on our sixth page, proposing that a subscription list should be opened in Dublin, in order to provide a public banquet for the officers and men of the 18th Royal Irish, and of the depot of the 88th, now lying at Athlone. On a future day, not yet named, but which cannot be far distant, the gallant 18th—the only regiment that can boast of having penetrated into Sebastopol while still in possession of the enemy—will be presented with a new stand of colors to replace the old ones that have been torn and shattered in many a well-fought fight. The colors are to be presented by the Lord Lieutenant in the name of the Queen. Our correspondent suggests that the occasion should be seized upon to give expression to the feelings with which the people of Dublin regard their brave countrymen—that there should be a general holiday—a grand public procession, and finally a dinner in the park to the soldiers. We heartily approve of the proposal, and are glad to find that it has received the warm support of our cotemporary, the Evening Packet. The people of Dublin owe it to themselves to express in the most marked, public, and emphatic manner, their appreciation of the gallant conduct of their countrymen. Such a mark of approval will be most valuable and gratifying to the brave fellows themselves. It will show them that when they become soldiers they are not degraded into mere machines, cut off from all communion with their countrymen, but that when fighting the battles of civilization abroad, their career is watched at home with eager interest, and their acts of heroism recorded as subjects of national pride.

THOMAS DEVIN REILLY.

From the Daily News.

It is difficult to write of the dead, for either the veneration inseparable to the contemplation of a departed fellow being renders the pen an organ of adulation and distortion, (as in Abbott's Napoleon,) in which case, even his warmest admirers become disgusted, and thus, insensibly, the misguided worshipper injures the reputation of his idol, or else, the biographer, resolving to show his stern reverence for Truth by writing the fact, becomes himself the target of reproach, (as Johnson for his life of Milton,) and enjoys the distinction of being considered by posterity as a slanderer and a malignant. Fortunately we run no chance of these Scylla and Charybdis in our little sketch of the late T. D. Reilly, one of the most single-hearted of men, and one of the most vigorous of Democratic writers. Everything he did was done with a will. There was no "willing to wound yet afraid to strike," when he was once armed with his pen, for although personally, he would not have hurt a fly, yet in a political or literary combat, he neither gave nor accepted quarter. In his deadliest conflicts there was a half good tempered, jolly ferocity about his style which reminded us of the man who swore he never fought so well as when he had a thorough affection for his antagonist as well as the cause he battled for. Nothing pleased him more than getting hold of Prince Albert or Lord Palmerston; he pummeled the Irish Premier equally with the German Prince, and poured out the Niagara of his sarcasm, jokes, grim bantering and hearty abuse, just as an infuriated housemaid empties a pail of soap suds over an impudent dandy.

Reilly was born in the North of Ireland, about thirty-five years ago, and received a good education, which he had much increased by multifarious reading. This was not lost, for being blessed with an excellent memory, his mind became stored with a vast quantity of facts, illustrations and jests, which were sometimes so interwoven in his articles, that, like a mass of dates, or figs, they are so jammed together that it is impossible to separate one from the other. To a careless reader his articles may appear desultory and wandering, but a closer study developes a plan, and although he did not go direct to his conclusions, yet his ramblings had a meaning, so that in his wildest episodes there was "a method in his madness." His best productions were his contributions to the Democratic Review, although, in the American Whig, there is a paper called London Assurance, full of wit and invective.

In person Mr. Rielly was square and of a medium height; his complexion was fresh and fair, eyes light grayish blue, with hair between a very light brown and a dark sandy. He had a hilarious light generally playing in his eyes, which gave great animation to his countenance. He was not an eloquent converser, but he talked with great force and fervor, and left the impression of being a man who was thoroughly in earnest in whatever he undertook. His brow was not a lofty one, but it was compactly formed, a fact in phrenology not sufficiently borne in mind by the multitude. An ounce of silk can be made a more efficacious missile if tightly packed, than a pound if loosely arranged; so a little brain well cultivated is better than a large one neglected, although doubtless the large brain has the greater potentiality if well disciplined.

Reilly had a great command of language, and could take another's ideas and make an exposition equally well with the originator. Indeed, it seemed to us that he always wrote best when writing under another's inspiration. He had also wonderful power of continuous labor; on an emergency he could write an article of forty pages without stirring from his desk; but like all men of ardent temperament, he was addicted to procrastinating the minute of work. When he first arrived here, in 1849, he was engaged on the Tribune, and soon after was associated with Mr. Savage in the conduct of a paper whose name we forget. He then became, at the recommendation of Mr. Holly, one of the editors of the American Whig Review, then under the chief control of Mr. Whelpley, one of our finest political writers.

The fierceness of his attacks on the British Government having annoyed the chief proprietor, he was engaged by Mr. G. N. Sanders to contribute to the Democratic Review—then lately purchased by the ex-consul to demolish old fogies. The termination of the campaign having rendered the continuance of this organ unnecessary, he received the reward of his labors in the cause by an appointment in the Census Bureau in Washington. But the ways of Providence are inscrutable; for thus at the moment when he had attained a position of considerable emolument, he was attacked by apoplexy, and died about two years ago in Washington City, leaving a wife and child.

Mr. Meagher, with that generosity which is a feature in the Irish character, has resolved to raise funds for a monument to the memory of this bold fighter in the Democratic ranks; for, as yet, his grave is without even a stone to mark the spot where repose the ashes of Thomas Devin Reilly!

In addition to this mark of respect to the dead, Mr. Meagher contemplates creating a fund for the widow and child, an object to which every Christian will be proud to contribute. We, therefore, take this opportunity of stating that any one who wishes to aid so charitable a cause, can address the Editor of the Irish News.

Mr. Reilly's complication in the insurrection of Smith O'Brien in 1848, was the reason of his leaving the land of his fathers, which, like one of Shakspeare's ladies, he loved not wisely, but too well. Peace to the memory of an open, fearless, warm-hearted, and, it must be confessed, in politics, a fierce-headed man!

THE IRISH VOTE.

SPEECH OF FRANCIS A. JACKSON IN BROOKLYN.

FELLOW CITIZENS:—This Presidential contest, in which all of us are more or less engaged—in which we, as freemen, are vitally concerned, will be highly important in its result, to the future of the Republic, and leave a mark on its history that will live through all time, for the curses or the blessings of generations of men. Much good or much evil must flow from it, for both sides cannot be right; and woe betide the evil doers.

The Republic is now undergoing a severe and trying ordeal, as fully important to her future destiny as that out of which, owing to the truth and courage of the patriots of the Revolution, she so gloriously emerged, arrayed in white garments, brilliant like the sun, having crushed a like conspiracy against the nation's liberties and her life. As England was the head and front of that conspiracy, so is she the front and head of the present. It is she who is its genius, its prime mover and abettor. It is a deep and dark conspiracy against the Union, the Constitution, and the perpetuity of the Republic. Be not deluded, my friends, by the numerous false issues that every day are raised. Let not the tears you shed over Kansas blind your eyes as to the only true and real issue now presented to the people of these States by the Know-Nothings on the one side, and Abolitionists on the other—more properly, the same side. The issue is not Kansas, free or slave; but "Shall the Constitution and the Union of these States, and the common equality and fraternity of its citizens, be preserved, or forever be destroyed?" That is the true question you have to answer.

Oh! the present is a time of peril. Treason! loud and defiant—treason, treacherous and blasphemous—treason, the vilest and most ungodly, now stalks abroad over this whole land of Washington, threatening to pull down this grand temple of human liberty, erected by the hands and sanctified by the blood of those noble men whose immortal names and magnificent deeds gild and adorn the brightest pages, not of America's alone, but of the world's history. Talk no more of the villainous deeds of royal Neros; talk no more of Cataline's conspiracy; it is far outshone; for never before had evil of so much magnitude been attempted, as this which now is directed to undermine the grand foundation of our liberties, and efface the stars which are the beacon-light, and the hope of entire humanity.

Under God, in the triumph of Democratic principles now rests the salvation of the Republic. The Democratic party stands on the platform of the Constitution. They alone stand forth in the breach, the last remaining hope of the whole country; North, as well as South—East, as well as West; recognizing every man a citizen whom the Constitution declares such, no matter where chance gave birth to him; fully and freely according to all—to citizens, to territories, and to States, every iota of their Constitutional privileges and rights.

Here Mr. J. proceeded to remark upon the "Ostend Manifesto," claiming that, although the enemies of Mr. Buchanan charge that it is essentially a filibustering document, and that if Mr. Buchanan be elected and shapes his policy in accordance with the principles laid down in it, that war with all maritime powers must be the inevitable result. On the contrary, such a policy would be the surest guarantee against war.

The so-called "Republicans" profess a holy horror of the African slave trade; yet, one of the reasons given in the "Ostend Circular" for the recommendations offered in regard to Cuba, is, "that it is the only possible way in which the infamous traffic can be abolished." Even the London Times, that zealous supporter of Mr. Fremont, lately declared, "that so long as Cuba continues governed as she is, affording a slave market to the world, there can be no hope of effectually stopping it."

But these "Republicans" are all philanthropists—all tender-hearted men, humanitarians, bless the mark! Ah! it would be better for the colored race were one-half of them buried in the sea. Whenever the Northern abolitionists—for let us call things by their right names—could coin a single dollar or a cent out of the bodies or the souls of negroes, their "humanitarianism" never stood one inch in their way. So long as the slave-trade was legal, it was they who drove the largest traffic in what they now call "human chattels." The merchants of Boston filled their coffers out of it. But now, since it is no longer legal, it is no longer profitable, and therefore we see them grow wonderfully pious all in a moment, and weep bitter tears of sympathy and condolence over the fate of poor "Uncle Tom." They now declare, that though they reserved for themselves their right to consult their own time and interests in abolishing slavery in their State, and though their sister States of the North reserved the same right, that the Southern States shall not do so; that the South shall not consult its time and interests—that it shall have no voice in the matter—that it must be governed, be commanded exclusively and entirely, by Faneuil Hall; or, rather, by Exeter Hall; and the South very properly says, "We won't submit!" They deny States'-rights as well as Territorial rights. Both are equal to them. Neither can their "humanitarian" consciences admit of. They further tell you the South is "an incubus." What! the South "an incubus;" whereas, it is Southern men who are the producers, while the majority of the abolitionists are only bankers, and brokers, and consumers, who can simply "drive a good trade" on the fruits of Southern industry.

Ah! but you are told, "Freedom is national, Slavery is sectional." Now, what does that mean! Shakspeare! there is something in a name. It hath, at least, a spell around it—a magic in its sound. If the persecuted of Europe, if the hunted of tyrants, if the starved of Ireland, if the murdered and Bastille'd of France and Germany and Hungary and Poland, and other down-trodden nationalities, be simply slaves, then are the slaves of America LORDS!

Would these abolitionists have us believe that the 350,000 slaveholders of the South are going to buy us all up to-morrow, and send us to work on their plantations! Who, in the North or South, has ever denied that Freedom is national! For my part, I have no fears for my freedom, unless abolitionism triumph and give it the mortal stab. Free treason is not national. Freebooting is not national. Nor is proscription in any shape, nor free love. This senseless shriek about "Freedom national, and Slavery sectional," is just as absurd and ludicrous as that other about "Americans ruling America." None others than the citizens of the United States of America have pretended to rule America under its Constitution since King George and his myrmidons were kicked out of it. The amusing bipeds who shriek about "Americans ruling America," would, too, have you believe that the Pope was coming over here to-morrow, to let one of his terrible bulls out at you, in order to poke and butt and slay you all with his big horns.

Is it not time to expose and trample on all this! These traitors and knavish humbugs disgrace not alone America but the very age in which we live. It is for you, TRUE AMERICANS, men of brain and common sense, lovers of your country, her prosperity and her freedom—of liberty, of justice, and of truth—it is for you to trample down the snakish monsters that seek to coil themselves around and check the Republic's true destiny. It is for you, now, to strike manfully and boldly. Do your duty to your whole country in its darkest hour of need. And you who have seldom or never voted before, vote this time—the crisis has arrived. You, who are naturalized citizens, stand by the Constitution you swore to support. Do your duty, all of you, to your children and your children's children. The present as well as the future demands it of you. Rise up as one man in the righteous cause, and slay the hydra of Know-Nothing intolerance and proscription; slay, too, the hydra of abolitionism and hypocritical philanthropy. Stand by the Constitution handed down to you by Washington, Jefferson and Adams, and which has worked so well—elevating the degraded colony into the proudest position among the nations! By doing so, you conquer treason—you conserve Liberty. Civil and religious liberty will continue to shine forth on the escutcheon of the Republic! Thirty-one stars, and more, will yet emblazon her Flag! Posterity will bless your ashes. See to it in November next, when the sun goes down, that History will not have to record the inevitable downfall of the grandest structure ever raised by man, going down in one crash into ruin and chaos; but will proclaim, many-tongued, to all the ends of the earth and to all generations—The Constitution is vindicated, the Union and our Liberties are safe! The Republic is yet full of life—vigorous, powerful and free! It will pursue its destiny—it will accomplish its mission. Not one star is off her banner, not one citizen is disfranchised, the work is consummated—the storm which raged so furiously is over, the dark clouds are gone, and the sky is clear and the sea is troubled no more. The Ship of State, no longer lashed by the black waves of fanaticism, moves proudly and majestically on—the stars and stripes flying from her masthead, and James Buchanan at the helm. Abroad, then, in every land, may yet rise the laureate giant of young Democracy, brandishing his scimetar, blending his voice with the creatures of the sky, in wildest rhapsodies of Freedom, the music of which, as it penetrates the clouds, will make the very heavens smile!

LETTER FROM JOHN O'MAHONY.

113 Prince street, Brooklyn, Sept. 1st, 1856.

MY DEAR MEAGHER—I feel forced to intrude upon your space by a misstatement that has appeared in your last issue, in which my name is mixed up. It is contained in the communication headed "Munster News," and signed "Mount-Garret the Bagman."

Having bestowed some well-merited praises upon the late John Power, of Gurteen, your correspondent goes on to remark, speculating upon the possible conduct of that gentleman with regard to our attempted Irish rising in '48, that—"if the people fought in '48, I know he was sure to be with them. His visit to O'Mahony's camp was not, as it was considerately made to appear, compulsory. It was made to see if there was such force, such preparation as would give even the slightest promise of success. There wasn't, and he went home sad and disheartened."

Now, as to Mr. Power's revolutionary tendencies, I can assert nothing positive myself. I knew nothing on the subject until now, and feel happy to hear his patriotic intentions thus proclaimed by one who appears to have known him intimately. Until now, it was my own impression that the sentiments of that lamented gentleman, though National and Catholic, were essentially loyal and aristocratic. However that may have been, I am certain that Mr. Power was not and could not be actuated in any political act of his in '48, or at any other time, by any motives which were not honorable, high-minded and chivalrous. I am certain that his visit to the Insurgent camp in the County Waterford was not the result of the somewhat cowardly and selfish spirit of cautious and canny forecast attributed to him by your correspondent. In my opinion, his visit was exclusively the result of a sincere and humane concern for the safety of the men there assembled, many of whom were his own tenants and nearly all of whom were the friends and well-wishers of his ancient house. This noble and generous impulse was, as I believe, the only motive that led him to imperil both his personal safety and his reputation for loyalty to his sovereign upon the occasion mentioned above.

But this gentleman's loyalty or disloyalty is not the point to which I would refer more especially. Your correspondent has stated erroneously that Mr. Power visited what he designates as my camp, and thereupon insinuates a charge against the brave mountaineers of Waterford. Now, the fact is that Mr. Power did not visit any camp where I was or where I had been at all. I never even saw the gentleman during the whole of '48, except once, and then he was merely pointed out to me at some distance, shooting over his own preserves. Had he had any intention of joining the insurrection, I infer that he would have had some communication with me during the seven or eight weeks I was striving to re-weld the broken links of our confederacy in his very neighborhood. In that neighborhood, unaided except by simple, though brave and devoted peasants and mechanics, I endeavored to organize my conspiracy alone, and, utterly unsupported by any of the experienced or master-minds of our party, I baffled all the force that the authorities could bring against me, and plotted against them in their very garrisons and camps—camps and garrisons that I thus found out to be only waiting for an opportunity to turn over to the people. That opportunity I did not give them, simply because I had no helpers to share the labors of mustering our people with myself. I was crushed by the hugeness of the ill-constructed machine that I was reluctantly forced to set in motion prematurely. Such is my only excuse for all my failures and short-comings. The people are perfectly blameless as far as I am concerned. They never through either coward- or dissent deserted me. They proved true to the last. There was no dissension anywhere whilst I was personally present, or, as your correspondent has it, in my camp.

Now, though I do not wish to bear more than my own share of the blame attached to what, with all our good leaves, I will call, the Irish fiasco of '48, I have still up to the present forborne to make any public allusion to my part in spoiling the finest opportunity that Ireland ever had of asserting her freedom. I have abstained from alluding to the subject or offering any palliatives for my many mistakes, notwithstanding the fact that some professed friends have made my attempt more Quixotic than it really was, and at most worthy of compassion—damning it with ill-timed and awkward praise, than which the fiercest vituperation were more endurable. As I am not a public man, and care little for fame outside the valley of the Suir or out of sight of the peaks of the old Gaulties, I should continue silent still were not my name now connected with the oft-repeated but no less falacious and disingenuous charge of want of force, spirit, devotion, courage, &c., now "sidelin sklented" at the brave peasantry of South Tipperary and Waterford, by "Mount-Garret the Bag-man!"

The Waterford assemblage of insurgents which Mr. Power visited was composed of as brave and determined a set of men as ever lived. They were, it is true, badly armed and totally undisciplined. They had no one they knew to lead them, and thus being nearly "all officers," their organization was not likely to be the most perfect. They could not then have presented a very promising aspect to a gentleman like Mr. Power, whose notions of a camp had been probably formed upon those fancy constructions used on gala days by the British army round Dublin or London. Still, all the elements for a brave and obstinate struggle were contained within that camp at Carriginoogh, and all the external concomitants necessary for a locally at least successful one surrounded it. All that was wanted was a sufficient number of intelligent and willing minds to set its forces to work with some ensemble, and to divide the labor so that each particular branch should perform its functions in due time and place. It was the want of these minds that defeated my attempt. It was, perhaps, chimerical in me at that late hour to have thought of any scheme so extensive as to need them. As it was, I, even if competent, could not make myself ubiquitous, like the bird of our facetious countryman. Every scattered band of 40, 50, 500, or 1000 men expected to see me, and were disappointed if they did not meet me at every place of muster. I tried to compass too much—the time was lost, and I was beaten before my men had mustered.

I am now by no means self-complacent on the subject. Still I do not regret the part I then played. If I have done no other good, I have at least proved to the stout peasantry and mechanics of Tipperary and Waterford's satisfaction (if to that of no others), that the failure was not through their own faults. Such references made to them as that of your correspondent's, and some other things said of them and me by writers upon '48, render it incumbent upon me to give at length some explanation of the extraordinary, and if all said be true, the exceedingly inexcusable part I acted. Such an explanation I shall soon give to the Irish public. Besides, I do not wish that the dwellers on the rolling Comeraghs and by the silvery Suir should be persuaded to despair in their stout hearts and stalwart arms by such thoughtless, and scarcely ingenuous remarks as those of your correspondent.

I remain, very sincerely yours,

JOHN O'MAHONY.

Thos. Francis Meagher, Esq.

LETTER FROM AN OFFICER OF THE NICARAGUAN ARMY.

NEW-YORK, September 6, 1856.

To the Editor of the Irish News:

DEAR SIR—

Having just returned from Costa Rica, where I have been detained as a prisoner of war for the last four months, and being anxious to impart what little information I obtained with regard to Central America, (during a residence of seven months in that country,) to the people of the United States, and especially to those about to emigrate to that fertile region,—and knowing of no better medium than through the columns of your widely-circulated journal, I would in the first place remark, with regard to Nicaragua, that a more beautiful country never existed.

The climate, soil, scenery, &c., surpass description. To those about to emigrate for agricultural purposes, Nicaragua has a special claim on their attention—there are thousands of acres of rich alluvial soil, which only require the burning off of the chaparral or undergrowth, to be immediately converted into a state of cultivation, and on which can be raised corn, and all kinds of grain, and in fact every production peculiar to any climate. This land is distributed to emigrants free, in lots of 250 acres each. To those of a more aspirant disposition, and especially those ambitious of military fame, that country offers unlimited scope for their abilities. The second Washington, General Walker, has an army of between twelve and thirteen hundred men, and is semi-monthly receiving recruits to aid him in his noble undertaking. He offers to each emigrant on his arrival the choice of entering the army for one year, at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month with 250 acres of land, or becoming a settler, just as the emigrant feels disposed.

I, on my arrival in Granada, the Headquarters of General Walker, took the latter choice, and was duly initiated in the service of the then styled Filibuster chief. Not seeing any acts of Filibusterism committed in Nicaragua, as peace reigned supreme at that time throughout the country, we began to be impatient for excitement, when the little republic of Costa Rica, backed by English intrigues, declared a war of extermination against the North Americans in Nicaragua. Immediately after the return of the traitor, Schlesinger, from Costa Rica, General Walker despatched a force of 280 men under command of Schlesinger, with orders to advance on the frontiers of Costa Rica, and retreat on the information of the advance of an enemy. I happened to be one of the detailed, who comprised his force, and was attached to the "Voltigeurs" as courier, under command of Captain Rudley.

The people of the United States are already acquainted with the details of the skirmish at Santa Rosa. But allow me to inform the readers of the IRISH NEWS, that it was the intention of the American soldiers to stand and fight to the last man if they had not been deceived by their commander, who, it has been since clearly proved, sold the fight at Santa Rosa, for a consideration of ten thousand dollars. I with twenty-nine others, in one party, succeeded in making my escape from the immediate scene of action, and made for the woods, where we wandered nearly in a state of starvation for 29 days, when we succeeded in arriving on the shore of Lake Nicaragua, within forty miles of Virgin Bay, when fourteen of us were captured (five of the original twenty-nine having died in the woods and ten having taken another direction on the morning previous to our arrest) by a party of Costa Ricans disguised as pedlars, who set upon us with machetes (a sort of bowie-knife). We momentarily expected to be shot or hanged, as was as they informed us the fate of 19 of our companions taken at Santa Rosa, but they contented themselves with tying us in pairs with ropes, and marching us back to the residence of the Commander-in-chief at Liberia, who intimated that a servitude of ten years in the chain gang, would, he thought, have a tendency to quiet our filibuster temperaments. However, he did not carry his intimation into practice; as the breaking out of the cholera, brought by the Costa Rican army, after the battle of Rivas, from Nicaragua into Liberia, produced such a sensation and created such a panic, from the Commandant General down to the humblest senorita, that they forgot us prisoners in their excitement, until the President issued orders for our removal to Punta Arenas.

Here we were kept in confinement for one month, after which we were allowed the parole of the city, and told, if we pleased, to go to work and maintain ourselves on the proceeds. This all of us who were able did, as by so doing we were not under the immediate surveillance of the soldiers, and hoped on the first opportunity offering we would be able to effect our escape. A short time after our liberation on parole, I, with three or four others, made application to the captain of a French ship, a Frenchman, bound for Panama, for passage, telling him our case, but he refused, on the ground that his government was on friendly terms with that of Costa Rica. We eventually succeeded in getting a passage to Panama, on board of a schooner, the "Joseph Newitt," Captain James Corkhill, five of us in all, by working our passage. I am indebted to Mr. Hicks, late of the Navy, whose influence with Colonel Totten, of the Panama and Aspinwall Railroad, procured me a transit across the Isthmus, and who still further used his influence with the officers of the Illinois, and got me a passage to New-York, where I arrived on the morning of Friday, the 30th August.

During my stay in Costa Rica of almost four months, I learned from Costa Ricans obnoxious to the government of Juan R. Mora, that there is at this time ripening in that State the germ of a revolution that will overthrow the present republic, and that if General Walker (now that his government is recognized by that of the United States, and that he is no longer considered as a Filibuster Chief, but the Commander-in-chief of a National Army,) should invade that State, he would not have the forces that he fought at Rivas to contend against, as there are at this moment one-half the inhabitants of Costa Rica disaffected towards the administration of the present President.

Preparatory to the Battle of Rivas, the Costa Rican, San Salvador and Guatemala governments agreed to furnish each so many soldiers for the extermination of the Americans in Nicaragua. The Northern States for some reasons did not supply their men at the appointed time, and now since the occupation of Leon by the Guatemalians and San Salvadors, they have requested the Costa Ricans to dispatch as many men as they, the Costa Ricans, can raise, to intercept the Transit Route at Seripique; but the Costa Ricans steadily refused to ever again aid the Northern States in any way; and if General Walker continues to adopt his present policy of watchful inactivity, it is the opinion of several exiled Costa Rican officers, whom I had the pleasure of conversing with at Panama, that on the opening of the dry season in Central America, he will have no foe in Leon to contend against.

At present everything is perfectly tranquil in Nicaragua, and those about, or wishing to emigrate, need apprehend no molestation, if engaged in agricultaral or commercial pursuits. Hoping that you will give the enclosed space in your popular journal, I remain your's sincerely,

M. M. S.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 13, 1856.

PUBLIC SALARIES—SOMETHING MORE ABOUT THEM.

A good deal of misapprehension exists as to the comparative governmental expenses in the United States and Great Britain. There is a floating opinion in this country, also, that a great many of the higher appointments paid for by John Bull, are simply sinecures—Sheridan's witty and faithful interpretation being that a sinecure was "nothing to do and well paid for doing it." Precisely, in short, such an appointment as the Clerkship of the Hanaper in Ireland, valued at £800 a year, which Captain John O'Connell has begged and obtained from Lord Palmerston, on the plea, it is said, that there was nothing to be done, and that he (the said Captain) felt himself very capable of doing it!

In point of fact, however, the difference of expense in the two nations is not great, and (though Lord Ellenborough does receive £13,000 a year as Joint Chief Clerk of the Pleas in the Queen's Bench, to which he was appointed while yet a sucking infant by his father, the political judge) sinecures may be pronounced as in such a state of extinction and absorption, that few will be perpetuated after the death of the present holders.

The whole amount of net public English revenue averages £55,000,000 a year; but of this, however, £28,000,000 is disbursed to pay the interest on the National Debt. This leaves twenty-seven millions sterling for all other payments. Let us see what they are.

The Civil List is the whole payment made to Royalty for its support, and to maintain what is called "the honor and dignity of the Crown." The actual amount placed at the Queen's own disposal is £385,000 per annum. However, besides all this money, she gets what may be called money's worth, for she occupies several rent-free palaces, (on the repairs and keeping up of which a good deal of the public money is annually expended,) and is exempted from all the taxes—postage stamps excepted—which every other person in her realm has to pay. She faithfully promised, through Sir Robert Peel in 1842, to submit her salary to the Income tax, but he contrived to evade doing so. Prince Albert, as her husband, has a separate allowance of £30,000 a year, which his wife has contrived to double, by heaping upon him a variety of profitable appointments. His Royal Highness, who possesses large accumulative propensities, not only receives £3,000 a year as Governor of Windsor Castle, but also condescends to accept £300 a year as Constable of that palace, his wife's residence.

There are other Royal pensioners. England continues to pay £50,000 per annum to Leopold, King of the Belgians—an amount settled on him in 1816, when he married the Princess Charlotte. There are also annuities of £30,000 to the Queen's mother; of £17,000 to the Duchess of Gloucester; of £6,000 to the Duchess of Cambridge; of £6,000 between a couple of Cambridge Princesses; and of £12,000 to the Duke of Cambridge. This last named gentleman has pay as General in the army, and Colonel of the Guards, besides having salaries as Ranger of Hyde and St. James' Parks. He was lately appointed Commander-in-Chief of the army, with a salary of £9 9s. 6d. a day, or £3,385 a year; but as the person holding this appointment gets double pay if he also be a Field Marshal, it may be very safely prophesied that, ere many moons wane, His Royal Highness will hold the baton—carrying with it the increase of income. As the command he holds is administrative rather than active, the Duke of Cambridge will probably get on very well—though he did not superlatively distinguish himself in the Crimea.

We may take the public disbursements, in one shape or another, to Queen Victoria and her family, as close upon £600,000 a-year. A vast payment, no doubt; but some of the nobility actually have larger incomes than their Sovereign; and it has been plausibly argued that every pound expended by Royalty in England causes a thousand-fold disbursements, chiefly in London, for the good of trade, commerce, and manufactures. One of the State Balls, for example, attended by crowds of the nobility and gentry, may cost £5,000; but the expenditure by the guests, in dress, jewels, and equipages would probably amount to ten times that sum. So, in the compensating balance of society, frivolities unite in giving an impetus to Trade and employment to Industry.

It would be amusing to go into the details of Royal expenditure in England, had we space and time—to show the proud nobility soliciting for the "honor" of voluntary (but not unpaid) flunkeyism to Royalty—to follow the Duke of Devonshire or the Marquis of Westminster (the two wealthiest peers in England) into the precincts of the Court, eagerly contesting the "honor" of carrying white wands before the Queen, as Lord Chamberlain or Lord Steward of the Household (literally head footman and head butler), with the privilege of perpetually facing their "most gracious Sovereign"—stern etiquette imperatively demanding that none of the Queen's attendants, no matter how high their proud rank, shall let her see their embroidered skirts, which imposes the awkward necessity of their walking backward out of the Royal presence—to behold the Duchess of Sutherland in charge of the Queen's gowns, gloves, and gaiters—a sort of superior femme de chambre—to witness the humiliation of such veterans as Lords Anglesey and Hill, heroes of many a gallant fight, officiating as "Gold Stick" and "Silver Stick" at a Levee or a Drawing-room. But we cannot now go into such an exhibition—we must continue our account of public disbursements in England.

Annuities and pensions for civil, naval, military, and judicial sources are generally, and inaccurately, supposed to amount to a great sum in England. The annual disbursements, on these heads, slightly exceeds £350,000; diplomatic salaries and pensions are scarcely £180,000; and general salaries and allowances are about £270,000. The expense of collecting the revenue is not included in this account, as that is deducted from the gross receipts, only the net revenue being her considered. The total expense of the Administration of Justice, in all parts of the United Kingdom (with Supreme Courts of Law in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin), is about £1,000,000 annually. This does not include erection and repairs of prisons, the maintenance of prisoners, and the cost of officers' salaries, most of these disbursements being made out of the county, city and borough rates.

The four great sources of expense in England, are the army, the Navy, the Ordnance, and the Civil Service. Even in time of peace, the average payments on account of the three first-named items are very great. In 1853, which was before the War commenced, the payments were: For the Army, £7,018,-164; for the Navy, £6,625,944; for the Ordnance, £2,491,798. Here, then, for what are called "the military defences of the country," even in profound peace—(but which defences actually included soldiers and ships all over the world, to maintain supremacy in colonies which have ceased to be remunerative but are inclined to revolt)—is an outlay of sixteen millions sterling.

In the United States, the whole expenditure under the direction of the War and Navy Departments, may annually average some $20,000,000, or a fourth of the cost in England. The difference is caused by the fact that we have no colonies to keep in subjection by military force; that we maintain our navy for defence and not for aggression; and that our States' militias are no charge upon the general revenue of the country. Should the occasion require, at a fortnight's notice our well-disciplined volunteers would be a million in arms, and, as fast as ordnance could be supplied, our clippers, packets, and other vessels, would be ready to vindicate the national honor, whether assailed at a distance or insulted on the seaboard, or the great oceans which wash our extended territory. How different from England, where nineteen-twentieths of the male population has never fired even a fowling-piece, the Executive actually preventing them from possessing a gun or being trained to use it!

Against the vast payment, by England, to convert humanity into "food for powder," the said empire has generously appropriated about £250,000 for National Education. The disproportion reminds one, most unavoidably, of the half-penny worth of bread to the gallons of sack in Falstaff's memorable tavern-bill.

On account of "Civil Services"—meaning the whole internal administration of the country—John Bull annually pays some £4,000,000. Owing to the different manner in which the yearly balance-sheets are made out in the two countries, we are unable to make a close contrast between the expenditure proper of the United States and that of Great Britain. The comparison would be much in favor of this country, no doubt, but we suspect that the difference is rather nominal than real, and that, all things considered, the actual Civil Government of this country is not materially cheaper than that of England. Every one knows, as we said last week, that public salaries are lower here than abroad, but the work is better done—more faithfully—more honestly than with us here. Low payment of service is of itself the speediest way to those breaches of probity by which our Public Revenue constantly suffers diminution. It places temptation in a man's way, and almost woos him into wrong-doing.

Another point, wholly at variance not only with the highest, but with the general European practice, is the instability of our official tenure. Across the Atlantic, for example, the general practice is for a man to enter the public service at an early age, with ascertained ability and education for the department in which he is placed, and, commencing at a low salary (usually $400 a year for a lad of 18) gradually to rise to advanced pay and position, by sincerity, length of service, and acknowledged merit. Thus, in general, (though, of course, there are not numerous prizes of this amount,) a person who enters the service early and works his way forward, by time and merit, may expect to find himself, in middle-life, with from £5,000 to £10,000 a year, and the certainty, after a fixed period of service, (and earlier, should health fail,) of being able to retire on a pension equal to two-thirds of the highest rate of salary he has ever received. All Government appointments in England (with the exception of the few removals of political heads of departments, on a change of Ministry,) are invariably for life, and preferments and promotions, principally made by seniority, are rarely influenced by the interference of patronage or party. The consequence is, that as an official there enters his situation as a permanency, with increasing salary and position, the instances where he is dishonest are rare. With our temporary appointments, where a man's politics rather than his fitness, gain him an appointment, (not particularly well paid,) from which the chances are that he will be ousted within four years, it is not made his abiding interest to be honest. As the saying is, he "goes in for a pile," and too often becomes accessible to influences which put money in his purse, at the expense of the country which temporarily obtains his transient and nearly irresponsible services.

Even were the truth of these statements not generally recognized, we should not shrink from thus plainly declaring it. But we speak of what is only too well known, too generally lamented—insufficiency of public salaries—instability of public employment.

NICARAGUA—A FEW PLAIN WORDS ABOUT IT.

Stirring events are preparing in Central America. The latest advices from Granada announce that great preparations are being made on either side, for the ensuing struggle, which is to decide whether the practical and common-sense rule established by General Walker is to become permanent in Nicaragua, or whether the country is to be again given over to anarchy and misrule. In contemplating the existing antagonism in that country, we must not be led away by an erroneous belief that an oppressed or insulted people are struggling with a band of adventurers. This is not the case. The people in Nicaragua, and in all Central America, have really no existence as a body politic, as they have with us. The mass of the population is composed of a mixed race of Indian and white blood, in which the latter greatly preponderates, and it has ever been the tool and the prey of a limited class of men of greater intelligence, which has divided into two or more parties; and each has in turn ruled by force, and with plunder and extortion the impassive native race.

The advent of General Walker, invited by one of the opposing native factions, brought new ideas and more just theories of government to the country, and it was impossible that their establishment should not be resisted by the adherents of the old system. These could not admit the new doctrine that the government should not take the property of the citizen, and even the citizen himself, without remuneration, whenever the exigencies of faction demanded it, in the name of the public good. They could not conceive that there existed in the private individual a right which should be respected above their might, and that horses, mules, corn, and man, should not be pressed into their service, whenever their power gave them the ability to take them.

Under a government animated by such ideas the country sank almost, if not quite, to inanition; for property of no kind was safe in the possession of the weak, and men had no stimulus to labor, except to supply their daily wants. No man took an interest in the public affairs unless he belonged to the governing, or rather the plundering class, except so far as the dread of further exaction induced him to watch and distrust the existing authorities. The introduction of a better theory of government by General Walker, while it has released the mass of the inhabitants from the contributions that had hitherto weighed them down, has also deprived the governing class of the source of their wealth, and brought about the existing state of antagonism there.

This we believe to be a true view of the causes that have led to the present conflict between General Walker and some of his former supporters, now in union with their former antagonists. It is also proved, by the method and manner of the parties in bringing together their respective forces for the encounter. The native conscripts gathered for the ranks of the Rivas party, at Leon, are marched into that city, tied two and two together, while material and food are obtained by the indiscriminate appropriation of any private property suitable for the purpose that may be at hand. The inhabitants look upon this as a matter of course, for war has never been conducted otherwise among them. On the other hand, General Walker is gathering at Granada whatever the resources of the country will enable him to purchase, and is seeking to augment his disposable means by loans based upon the future peacefully-collected revenues of the Government. No man is plundered, no man is dragged from his home and forced into the ranks, but industry remains undisturbed, and individual safety is respected.

The struggle that is about to take place in Nicaragua is, therefore, the struggle of old theories against new, of injustice against justice, of anarchy against order. All the pride of national feeling is called up in support of the bad, because the good came from abroad, instead of having originated at home; and patriotism is invoked as urging every native citizen to join with those who wish to perpetuate their old system of misrule. Many quiet and unobserving citizens among ourselves are misled by this outcry, and believe that the aim of General Walker is unmitigated wrong. We have no doubt of the approaching strife. The reluctant natives that have been forced into the ranks of General Cabunas, the jealousy and conflicting interests of the several leaders among them, and their utter incompetency as military chiefs, all point to defeat, if dissolution does not come to them before the battle. That the permanent establishment of General Walker's government will redound to the true good of Nicaragua, and rapidly develope its material prosperity, no one can for a moment doubt.

JOHN KELLY AND HIS CONSTITUENTS.

Washington is a City of the Dead just now. President Pierce has gone to Warrenton Springs. Worcester has been shouting Speaker Banks through her streets. The fresh airs fanning the old houses of Newburyport cool the festive face and revive the wit of Caleb Cushing. Max Maretzek waves his fairy wand upon his Delphic throne in presence of the most bewitching beauty and wealthiest manhood of the South. The Senate, the Cabinet, the Departments, the Diplomatic body, the House—all are dispersed—broken up hither and thither, up and down, on sea-shore or mountain-top—all variously amusing and refreshing themselves—spending plenty of money—improving their muscle, sharpening their wits, preparing for the stump in October, the fatal day in November, and all the severities of winter.

Others of the public servants have returned quietly to their plain hospitable homes. Without any announcement in the papers—without a line under the head of Fashionable Intelligence—they resume the less conspicuous duties of life, moving in again amongst their fellow-citizens unobtrusively and noiselessly, as though they had not been away, mingling all the year past with the celebrities of the Capitol.

In this way, John Kelly, Representative of the Fourth Congressional District, returns to his constituents. They are heartily glad to see him. To ensure him a cordial greeting and congratulations without end, a preliminary flourish in the newspapers was not required. The people he represents, well know how faithfully he exercised the trust confided to him, and are prompt to reward with expressions of the friendliest favor the patient and efficient attention he has rendered, ever since his election to Congress, the questions claiming his advice, his support, or condemnation.

Thoroughly a man of the people, he has been watchful, active, and assiduous in the service of the people, faithful to their interests, their principles, and their good name.

We know not on any occasion on which his conduct can be called in question. We know of several wherein he acquitted himself with remarkable zeal, the soundest good sense, with a generous intrepidity and solicitude. The family of Thomas Keating had no truer friend. If justice has not been rendered them, it is not the fault of John Kelly. Of this, every Irishman in New-York and Washington is deeply sensible.

Industrious, fearless, zealous—in every sense reliable as a public servant—no one has a word to say against him, unless, indeed, it be those very refined gentlemen who, skipping about the flower-beds of life, have nothing on earth to do but criticize those who work for the public good, and who are so exquisitely exacting as to require every Member of Congress to be a Narcissus in symmetry, a Quintilian in rhetoric, and a Beau Brummel in breeches. An honest man in Congress is worth volumes of eloquence, and all the dainty nonentities and marrowless snobberies that ever dawdled up Broadway, dreamt of Paradise in a box at the Opera, or danced themselves out of their cambric and kids into the shadows of Greenwood.

Should John Kelly desire it, his re-election is certain. To defeat him, it would require a very eminent man to be started against him. It would require a man whose honesty is purer, whose good sense is sounder, whose heart is truer, whose devotion to the public interests lies upon the record more clearly proved. Eloquence will not suffice, nor gracefulness of person, nor suavity of manner, nor literary tastes or distinction—none of these things will suffice to outweigh the substantial merits of John Kelly, the recollection of what he has done, and the abundant promise he gives us of his future. He need have no fear. Not a whit. An inferior man will have no chance against him. Not the smallest. His superior—his superior in all that gives sterling value to a public man—is not easily to be had just now.

Let those who would think of having another in his stead, turn to his speech, delivered in the House of Representatives on the 9th of August, in reply to the calumnies of the Hon. Thomas R. Whitney, against the Catholic church, and see if they can choose a stauncher champion for the race and creed whom such men as Whitney grievously outrage, and, if they had the power, would infamously oppress.

YOUNG IRELAND FOR BUCHANAN.

Among the many bright circumstances which assure us of the success of the Democratic candidate, none affords us deeper satisfaction than the support he receives from a number of talented young citizens of Irish birth. The strength they bring him in this conflict is well worth having. Given with a full heart, it glows with intelligence and is fresh with enthusiasm. There is nothing cold, stinted, dull, or calculating about it. It is the chivalry of politics

The speech of Colonel Lochrane, of Georgia, published in our last number, and that of Francis Jackson, which appears in the present issue, suggest these remarks. To these speeches we refer with pleasure, pride, and confidence. Whilst the Democratic party has such champions in the Forum, no Irishman can hesitate which way to cast his vote.

The example of these young orators of the people, their eloquent bold words and spirited action, must surely dissipate amongst their countrymen all doubt, timidity, and prejudice. In the enthusiasm of youth there is wisdom, truth, nobility. The sagacity of age is oftentimes selfish, treacherous, and corrupt. If among the citizens of Irish birth there be any in this republic who feel disposed to vote against James Buchanan, let them turn to these speeches, and from them learn the duty they owe the Constitution from which they derive their citizenship.

If such men would stand by the Constitution, they must stand by James Buchanan. This is the pith of the speeches of Messrs. Lochrane and Jackson. This is their argument. This the truth which animates them. This the high sentiment under the influence of which their tongues are touched with fire. This the lesson they would, with all the force of their generous natures and fruitful intellects, impress upon their countrymen. Their countrymen will acquit themselves loyally to the American Union—will conduct themselves wisely and right nobly—by doing what these young citizens with so much heart and genius dictate.

MONUMENT TO DEVIN REILLY.

The meeting called at this office, on Wednesday, for the purpose of rendering to the memory of our friend and comrade, Devin Reilly, a tribute worthy of his noble heart and genius, was attended by men whose sincerity is a guaranty for the success of the project. Patrick Lynch, of the Irish-American, and Captain Lyons, of the Citizen, are conspicuously identified with it. The former acted as Chairman. The latter has been appointed permanent Secretary of the Committee authorized to collect subscriptions, and carry out the intentions of the originators of the tribute. Captain Phelan, Dr. Drew, Dr. McGowan, Captain Hogan, of Brooklyn, Adjutant McCarten, James Roche, Messrs. Folan, Lynch, and Haverty, have the honor of being the original members of this Committee. They have power to add to their numbers, and already several distinguished members of the Press and Congress have signified their desire to be placed on the Committee, and their determination effectively and zealously to aid it.

Generous subscriptions have come in. Dr. O'Reilly, of White street, sends $25, and with it a letter which shows that the gracious gift comes from the heart. Mr. Stuart, Lessee of Wallack's Theatre, also sends $25, accompanying the donation with eloquent and feeling words, expressive of his proud love of those whose genius, despite of their misfortunes, has given glory to the name of Ireland. Captain Phelan—ever prompt and noble in his action where a good, a kindly, or courageous deed has to be done—also hands in his $25.

And so, upon that lone grave in St. Matthew's churchyard, Washington, the golden tribute multiplies which yet shall be a chronicle of praise to him on whose cold breast it lies, and bread to his child, and an honored home to her, who, in the summer-glory of his genius, broke into bitter tears, kissing for the last time the frozen hand that could obey the glowing soul no more.

From time to time the Committee will publish the subscriptions in due form. The first publication of them will show that, along with those already named, Dr. Shelton Mackenzie and Adjutant McCarten, of the 69th Regt., are amongst the earliest contributors to this noble fund.

When a sufficient amount to provide for the widow and child, as well as to honor the dead, has been subscribed, the Committee are instructed to call a general meeting of the subscribers, and, by a public vote, determine the mode in which the twofold object of the testimonial—the Living and the Dead—will be finally accomplished.

TWO THINGS TO BE REMEMBERED.

The day John Mitchel was sentenced by Judge Lefroy, in Green street Court-house, in the city of Dublin, to transportation beyond the seas for the term of fourteen years, a scene took place in that same Court-house, which a thousand illuminations in the Phenix Park, and any number of Royal visits, will fail to blot from the memory of those who witnessed it.

John Mitchel was allowed by the presiding Judge to say a few words before the turnkeys—standing close behind him with their keys and chains—hurried him from the dock. The world has these words by heart:—

"My work has only begun," he exclaimed; "can I not promise for one, for two, for three—aye, for hundreds?"

A vehement cheer broke out—hundreds in the galleries, in the passages, about the dock, under the very Bench itself, leaped to their feet—a thousand eyes flashed defiance, vengeance, the fiercest passion—a thousand hands were flung aloft—a thousand voices echoed the hope and trust uttered from the dock.

"Promise for me, Mitchel—and for me—for me—for all!"

This was the cry of each—of all. In the grasp of his enemies, his doom pronounced, the war-ship panting for him in the harbor, his very life cut short, he had raised a storm before which the plunderers of his home and freedom quailed. The Jury—every man of them—reeled upon the spot. The Sheriffs looked aghast, staggered here and there, swung their arms about, and gasped for silence in the Court. Lefroy rushed from his red cushions, tumbled down the steps of the Bench, and buried himself like a murderer in the Judge's room. From every side—from every door—from every opening—the police—swords and pistols drawn—dashed in.

Still the hundreds in the galleries and passages were on their feet—still the wild fierce eyes flashed above, below, all round—still those outstretched arms with swollen veins shook in fury and defiance—still came the thundering cry—"Promise for me, Mitchel—promise for us all!"

Close above Mitchel—with neck, and arms, and wiry frame stretching over the wooden walls which enclosed the prisoner—with a screaming voice, and a quivering hand, and a face deadly pale with intense nervousness and excitement, with hypocrisy and fear—was one who, with louder tones than all the rest, cried out—"Promise for me, Mitchel—I'll follow you to death!"

It was John Gray—Editor and Proprietor of the Dublin Freeman's Journal.

How faithfully and decently that man has kept the promise sworn by him on that day, John Mitchel's letter to us, published this day week, has let the world know.

THE MAYORALTY.

A requisition, signed by many of the most eminent merchants of the city, and other gentlemen of high standing and social influence, has been presented to Mr. Wood, cordially and eloquently inviting him to present himself a second time before the people as candidate for the Mayoralty of New-York. The zeal, activity, and administrative talent of our chief magistrate find in the words of the requisitionists the fullest commendation Whatever the result of the election, Mr. Wood retains in his possession that which no vote can set aside—the written testimony, to his efficiency in the civic chair, of men whose substance and virtues constitute them pillars of the State.

POSTCRIPT.

An admirable letter from Mr. O'Neill, of Boston, on the new project of steam communication with Ireland, appears in another column. His views on the subject, and the clear and copious style in which he conveys them, renders unnecessary any remarks of our own.

The communication from John O'Mahony, promised in our last, occupies the space it deserves. Another letter from the same pen, and touching the same subject, will appear in our next.

We are happy to find, on reference to our advertising columns, that Alexander C. Lawrence, Esq., has been appointed General Emigrant Agent of Nicaragua for the United States by the Government of Nicaragua. This appointment has been well deserved. From the first, Mr. Lawrence has been an enthusiastic and useful friend of the brave men, who, under Gen. Walker now hold that country, despite of native perfidy and foreign piracy, for its own advantage, security, and glory. The answer of Dumouriez to the factions of Paris—"I'll save Paris in spite of herself"—is the text from which a true panegyric of General Walker, reciting his career in Nicaragua, might be written. The Government of Nicaragua has a faithful and active representative and agent in Mr. Lawrence, and whilst we congratulate those who confided to him this important trust, we congratulate himself on the recognition which his services in the grandest cause now stirring in the world have in this appointment so creditably met.

A letter from an officer of the Nicaraguan army will be found among our correspondence. His personal experiences sustain us in the opinions we have all along expressed. From an aversion to anything like notoriety, he withholds his name—simply giving his initials. We vouch, however, for the authenticity of the letter, having warmly shaken hands with the writer, and spoken to him freely and at full length upon the subject of his letter.

With Major Heiss, too, we have had, within the last two days, the most agreeable and instructive conversation, the result of which is to confirm conclusively the strong convictions we have from the beginning entertained of General Walker's success. The Major laughs at the idea of Walker's position being in the least affected by the movements of Honduras and Guatemala. His supremacy there is a fixed fact, and with his supremacy will come life, stability, and an illustrious consequence to the country he has with such calm nerve and wisdom rescued from the bloody barbarism of rapacious and insatiable factions.

PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS.

PLEASURE-TRIP TO AUSTRALIA IN A MAN-OF-WAR—ODDS AND ENDS FROM A TORN-UP LOG-BOOK—SEA-DRIFT AND SEA-WEED.

OLD STYLE.

Monday morning, July 9th, 1849, 9 o'clock, Cornelius Cooper, Deputy Governor, Richmond Prison, Dublin, entered my cell in said prison. Informed me that the Governor of said prison had received a communication from Mr. Redington, Under-Secretary for the English Government of Ireland, notifying him that orders had been issued for the immediate transportation of the Political Prisoners in his custody.

William Smith O Brien, Terence Bellew McManus, Patrick O'Donohue, and Thomas Francis Meagher, were the prisoners in question.

In bed the time I was notified—got up—dressed—wrote a few letters.

Half-past ten, Police van, escorted by fifty mounted Police—pistols and carbines—pulled up within the wall of the prison. Three troops of Dragoons—6th Carbineers—under command of Colonel Maunsel—arrived shortly after.

Half-past eleven, entered the Van. Tears, farewells, waving of handkerchiefs. At a rapid pace, driven off to the Pigeon House. Artillery-men at their guns. Guns loaded. Colonels, of all branches of her Majesty's service, on the ground. Most of them with red noses. Boats of the Dragon, war-steamer, in readiness. Each boat well manned. A Lieutenant commanding. In two or three minutes the Dragon brings us to the Swift. The Swift lies at anchor a little outside the light-house on Kingstown pier. A ten-gun brig, very trim, bright, and rakish.

On board the brig, introduced to the Captain. Shown to our cabin.

Half-past three, under weigh. Passing Bray Head, permitted to walk the deck. Previous to doing so, the Captain, accompanied by the Surgeon, read us the rules we had to observe during the trip.

Rules simple enough. Two only permitted on deck at a time. Lights extinguished nine o'clock every night. No communication with any of the ship's company, Captain and Surgeon excepted. No smoking save on deck, abreast the main-mast, and then at stated hours only. Hours stated, between one and two, p.m., and five and six, p.m. Meals supplied by British Government. Same scale as supernumeraries. So nominated in the bond.

Rules being read, O'Brien and I went on deck. Within gun-shot of the Wicklow coast. Half-past five—clouds thickening—dinner served. Served by a marine with cross-belts and bayonet. Dinner consists of two pounds of hard beefsteak—plate of sea-biscuit—a jug of tank water. The jug had a white body and a blue fringe.

Sergeant of Marines, wearing sash and side-arms, carrying a dark-lantern, visited us at nine o'clock. Extinguished our lamp—swung his lantern in our faces—wished us good-night—locked the door—handed the key to the Captain.

Following morning—July 10th—seven o'clock—off the Waterford coast. A bright beautiful morning. Will no one come out to hail me from Dunmore? I pass by, and my own pople know nothing of it.

Sit down to breakfast. Breakfast consists of black tea, brown sugar, sea-biscuit and salt butter. Nothing remarkable between breakfast and dinner. Dinner consists of roast beef, preserved potatoes, cabbage, and half a pint of wine.

Between five and six o'clock, a large steamer in sight. Supposed to be from the Cove of Cork. The Swift signalled. No response.

Two days following—the same to be said. Next two days—the same. Two more days—nothing more. The evening of the 14th, entertained with the first performance of Viscount Ockham on the slack rope. This young nobleman is not more than thirteen years old. He goes out to join the British squadron at Valparaiso. Plain and gentle in demeanor, he has a heavy face, lit up with fine black liquid eyes. He is grandson of Lord Byron. His father, Earl of Lovelace, being married to Ida, daughter of Childe Harold.

July 15th. 200 miles off Lisbon. Large merchantman two miles to leeward. Exchanged signals. Find it's the Wellington, from London, bound for Hobart Town, Van Diemen's Land.

Wellington very inquisitive. Ladies on board. Signals used by both ships, those laid down by Captain Marryatt. Went below. Read Chateaubriand's Memoirs. Magnificent picture of Mirabeau. Full of impenetrable shadow and lurid light. Nothing finer from Danby.

Nothing worth noting until Wednesday, July 18. Went on deck half-past seven. The Desertas on our starboard, ten miles off. Look extremely beautiful. In the quiet, soft, purple light of the morning, they rise up, with broken outline and spiral peaks. A mile or so from the main group, jutting up in fragments from the calm sea, we have a small rock, flung like a wreck upon the ocean. Ascertain from the Doctor these islands are thinly inhabited. Four or five poor Portuguese families, occupied in fishing, form the entire population. Madeira lies thirty miles to the South.

Twelve o'clock. Have passed first group of the Desertas. Second looms in the distance. Madeira lies between the two groups, thirty miles westward. The day is full of loveliness. The water is a deep blue. The sky the same. Above the Desertas, in the direction of Madeira, there lie a few white clouds, sparkling like freshly-fallen snow. Are they not large swans, fallen asleep in the light of the sun, and with folded wings floating in dreams above the waters?

In the evening, hundreds of porpoises bounce and plunge about the ship. Quarter-Master out upon the bows, with his harpoon, striking at them. Succeeds in striking one. Just over the bows, the wounded porpoise slips off, leaving a wide waste upon the smooth surface red with blood. The porpoise plunges in agony to the bottom. Lit my pipe. Smoked it, leaning on the hammock-nettings.

Seven o'clock, on deck again. Never looked upon so sweet, so grand a scene. The sun—the face of some giant streaming with blood—looked out from behind great bars of green and purple clouds. The Desertas, intercepting the crimson avenue between us and the sun, filled the sea about the ship with shadows—dark beautiful funeral plumes, soft and forest-like. The bright tranquil air, it seemed to me, was laden with perfume, and the fresh breath of wild flowers, and shining leaves dripping with wild honey. With these mingled the fragrance of the orange, and the lemon, and the vine. Now and then, a sea-bird—white wings and dusky gray breast—wheeled across our lazy track, and as it passed that burning pathway between us and the sun, it seemed as if it were turned to sapphire, whilst the spray, dropping from its white wings fell, like diamonds upon the blue surface. Silently, in the midst of its own glory, the sun went down.

The air grew softer. The shadows at the base of the Desertas grew deeper still. The sailors grouped about the foremast—necks and arms bare—sang many a sweet and noble song. Never did I listen to music which thrilled me more. In such circumstances—out in such solitudes and silence—music ever wakens recollections of the shadowy past—calling us back with tears in our clouded eyes to the flowers that have faded, and the haunts of summer birds whose song is hushed for ever.

At that moment—for the first time since bidding it farewell—I thought mournfully of Ireland—thought of her until she seemed to rise from the waters near me—and I saw her tall Round-towers, her oaks, her little old churchyards, with their mouldering wooden-crosses, and the whitened tombstones netted with briers and ivy roots, her Holy-wells, her lakes—all glittering in the red light which still came streaming from the burning mountains of the West. I shut my eyes upon the sad but glorious picture. I cannot bear to weep for Ireland when I can give her no helping hand.

O'Brien read for us this evening the life of Alcibiades.

Nine o'clock. Sergeant Perry—cross-belts and lantern—as usual. Go to bed, Tom! Lamp extinguished—door locked—got out of my berth, and through the sky-light of our cabin listened for a few moments to the tread of the Watch on deck, the throb and rippling of the waters against the sides of the ship, and through the rigging, as through a black net-work, gazed upon the blue sky and the pale gold stars.

When I had freedom—God's leave and no Queen's pardon—why did I not see more of Ireland? Why not have seen every rock, stream, ruin, glen, cromleac, gap, grave-yard—her mountains—the broken gates of her old towns—the last remaining stones of her monasteries and castles? I waited to see the old land free, and so defrauded my youth of its joys and my memory of treasures without price.

Sergeant Perry puts an extinguisher upon another of our days at sea.

July 29th—Day excessively bright, hot, and calm. Island of Brava, one of the Cape Verd Islands, four miles to leeward. Everything is leeward. The island of Brava is very high—abounds in corn, live stock, and fruit—inhabited by a handful of black-men, described by the officers of the Swift to be most harmless, hospitable, generous. Another of this important group—the Island of Fuego—nine leagues from Brava—appeared at the same moment. Very indistinctly, however. It is the loftiest of the Cape Verd Islands. Has one peak—a magnificent peak—1,626 fathoms above the level of the sea—burning continually. From works published by the English Admiralty, 1845, I learn it has very few inhabitants. Even these few are sometimes compelled to leave it in consequence of the eruptions. On the Western side of the island lies a small town, called Nostra Senora da Luz.

Two o'clock this day spoke a large Dutch brig. First Lieutenant of the Swift boards her. The Lieutenant returning, we learn that the brig left Batavia on the 9th of April, and was bound for Rotterdam. In half an hour, a wide blue wilderness—nothing but sea and sky—lay between the two ships. The hues of the Dutch tri-color were soon lost in the purple haze of the desert through which we moved.

Chateaubriand has a beautiful passage descriptive of two ships meeting at sea:

"The crew and passengers crowd the decks, the ships approach, hoist their colors, shorten sail, and heave-to. As soon as all is silent, the two Captains, stationed on their respective poops, hail with the speaking trumpet—'What ship is that?'—'Of what port?'—'Captain's name?' &c. They shake out the reefs. The sails fill. The crew and passengers of the two ships look at each other as they speed on their course, without uttering a word. Some are hastening to the climes of Asia. Others to Europe. Time urges on its course, and separates travellers upon land, more quickly still than the wind separates them on the Ocean. A signal is made from afar. Farewell! The common port is Eternity."

Friday, July 27th, morning, and noon, and night, as usual. Smith O'Brien reading for us passages from the Fire Worshippers, and had come to these lines:

"Who has not heard of the Vale of Cashmere?
With its roses the brightest that——"

When Sergeant Perry bowed himself in, and extinguished our fire.

Next day, occupied ourselves writing out quotations from our favorite authors, and pasting or pinning them to the panels of our cabin.

Over my looking-glass were these words from Knelem Digby, the glorious author of the Mores Catholici:

"Patience is the exercise of saints—the trial of their fortitude—making them each their own deliverer and victor over all that tyranny or fortune can inflict.

A panel above the door-way displayed in bold hand the inscription:

Meum sit propositum in tabernâ mori
Vinum sit oppositum morientis ori
Ut dicant cum venerint angelorum chori
Deus sit propitius luri potatori.

MacManus set up the following:

Go! talk of Spring to the trampled flower,
Of light to the fallen star,
Of glory to him who in danger's hour
Hath fall'n in the fields of war.
But ye mock the Exile's heart when ye tell
Of aught save the home where he loves to dwell.

KIRK WHITE.

Wordsworth was a great favorite of O'Brien's. The boards above his washing-stand eloquently announced these truths and consolation:

——— One adequate support
For the calamities of mortal life,
Exists—one only!—an assured belief
That the procession of our fate, howe'er
Sad or disturbed, is ordered by a Being
Of infinite benevolence and power,
Whose everlasting purposes embrace
All accidents, converting them to good.

From Coleridge I selected this sentence, driving it home with pins against the head of my bunk:

Moral courage—the daring to suffer the present evil, be it an expiation for the past, or as an offering or a testimony to conviction, not lightly attained, is always its own great reward.

A line and a half from Virgil—

Etiam victis redit in præcordia virtus,
Victoresque cadunt—

expressed the sentiments of all. Underneath the quotation—O'Brien wrote it out—I underlined these words in pencil—

A fact—may it prove a prophecy!

THE SHADOW ON THE EARTH.

"A belief prevails among the peasantry, that the spirits of the departed, in the shape of the large night-moths and butterflies, revisit their former friends."—Mrs. S. C. Hall's Ireland, vol. I.

O the pure white butterfly, it roveth o'er the leas,
A portion of the sunshine, and a portion of the breeze!
White on the glittering ivy of the abbey wall it clings,
High and white on the emerald sward it lifts its veinéd wings;
Glancing where, beneath the alder boughs, the meadow-waters gleam,
A river-lily's petal seems to float above the stream:
Flitting among the berries red of the gray rowan-tree,
And never still, save when it rests upon the mound by me.

But the sunshine! who hath called it blest, which with relentless glare,
Makes every ruined thing stand out in the fierce light of despair?
It cleaves the yew's thick shade, to shine on graves in the holy fane—
It pierces through my claspéd hands down to my burning brain.
It lights up ancient shrines of thought, untenanted and lone,
As the sculptured niches of those saints low on the chancel strown:
No secret spot, so high, so deep, its presence may not win,
But the cold still mound beneath me, and the cold still heart within!

Yet it scathes not the white-wing'd thing that liveth in its light,
That hovers round and round me, as a Virgin-Bride bedight!
I saw not when, from cerement free, up to the sky it went,
For beneath the mould lies that to keep these hot eyes earthward bent.
Till a restless fleck on the solemn sward lifted on high my gaze,
And thoughts cleared out the clouded Past, as ships from the morning haze.
For then I knew that a pure white soul, in flitting from the earth,
Cast down the shade that holds me, and the wide world in its girth.

Of a maiden fair it minded me—was she a tale I read,
Shaped from the world of phantasms in some wild romancer's head?
Or visible and tangible? I know not:—it has been Long ages since, although this spot one summer hath made green.
In the colors of the Virgin this maiden bright was drest,
And the colors of the Virgin had passed into her breast;
And oh, the noble glance of mingled purity and truth,
Which she gave to him, the lover, the protector of her youth!

By the sea-beach, on the meadow; by the fairy-haunted rath,
Through all our wondrous summer, they are ever on my path.
With him I bend to hear her, through the gently-falling rain,
Cadencing his verses to some sweet old Irish strain.
Light the moonlight, moved her presence, 'mid the ruins hoar and strong,
Making that seem a beauty which, without her, were a wrong.
And, listening to her patient words, his proud, hot soul could mourn

Less for the glorious past from earth, than those from Heaven torn.

From the island-church returning—returning o'er the bay,
The tall cliff beckoning them to where their future home lights play;
Where the dark wave, pale with anger, lifts their pinnance on its crest,
As he girdles her with proud, strong arm, for the first time to his breast.
Through the lightning-flash and blackness—through the shrieking—through the strife,
I see him strike the waters wild, for love yet more than life;
I see him turn in rapture—to the knowledge that he bore
Another—not his fond, young wife, and then—I could see no more!

With her white robes clinging round her, they drew her from the wave;
With her white robes smoothed round her, they laid her in her grave;
And he—the fever burnt his brain, as the sun-flame scorches mine.
And he fled, like me, from fame, from friends, from home and holy shrine,
To pace in the cold starlight, with a grave like this in sight,
To lay his weary head where mine lay, through last lightless night;
To sit all day, a thing of fear, beneath a shadeless tree.
Why do ye look so piteously? Man, man! Can I be he?

Oh, mavourneen! oh, mavourneen! oh, my darling! oh, my own!
Not thus wouldst thou have left, in this strange, wild world alone!
Not thus! although thy destined seat is vacant in my room;
Not thus! although thou gladdenest not the morn with thy young bloom.
The wreath upon the virgin's brow is mouldering to dust;
The clasps of the holy books you loved are stiffening with rust;
Thy mother's hair is silvering—thy sister's cheek grows wan.
They have but tears to give me now!—but yet, thou art not gone!

Not gone, beloved! No, no, not gone! For I have but to close
Those sleepless eyes, and feign, what I must never feel, repose.
And there thou bendest over me, as longing to endow
Me with the peace that quells; a seraph-sorrow on thy brow
And pointing ever upward!

Ha! once again in sight!
Speak low! why comes this messenger in bridal robes bedight?
Yes! radient thing of heavenly flight! Worlds cradled at thy birth!
I will look upward and not see the shadow on the earth!

CLEENA.

UNITED STATES EXPEDITION—CHILE.

However politicians may wrangle over the amount of money spent by Congress in printing books, there must be few indeed so barren of national pride as not to view with praiseworthy exultation the records which the young Republic has added to the annals of Discovery, in geographical, topographical, geological, meteorological, ornithological, and botanical science, and to natural and physical history in general.

The various exploring expeditions fitted out by the United States Government, having in view the earth, the ocean, or the heavens, pursued, as they have been, by the characteristic energy of the nation, heightened and enlightened by scientific enthusiasm and patient persistence, suggest some of the noblest chapters in its history, and exhibit, certainly, not the least useful phases of the power entrusted to it by the people. They reflect credit on the country by adding to the history of the world, and must command a deep respect; based, as the claim is, not alone on the well-earned and highly commendatory capacity of the country for war, but on the profound evidence of her capacity to pursue and cultivate those fields of scientific inquiry which yield peace a history more enduring and not less brilliant than that of war.

Humboldt's stately tomes, the Kosmos, are surely not less interesting, if they are not really more useful, than those of Jomini and Napier, on The Campaigns of Napoleon and The Peninsular War. Fitch and Fulton, by their application of steam, have proved themselves not less worthy of patriotic reverence than the warriors of the Revolutionary era; for, by their assiduous devotion, the hard-won nation was pushed into a strength without precedent in a space of time almost fabulous, its resources mastered, its extent measured with more alacrity than its necessities actually demand. Thus Maury, who, if he does not master the winds and tides, confers the power to cope with them, reflects not less credit on the American name than Scott or Taylor, who beat the Mexicans. Kane's expeditions to the pale Arctic regions are already more famous than the ceaseless frontier war against the red men; and the scientific expedition to the Southern Hemisphere, though it looked as far above the earth as the heavens, is more creditable to the country than the very uncivil—and some think it the nearest approach to civil—war at present raging between the partisans on either side of Mason and Dixon's line.

All of these movements are more or less necessary, no doubt, but there is one thing certain, and that is, however anything of a contentional nature may and must create difference of opinion as to their merits, the usefulness of the opposite order must, from the very intention in which they were conceived, remain unquestioned.

One of the most interesting works published by order of Congress, as far as we learn, is a Report of the United States Naval Astronomical Expeditions, under Lieutenant J. M. Gilliss, to the Southern Hemisphere, during the years 1849, '50, '51, and '52. Putnam's Magazine for the present month contains a very useful and circumstantial article, reviewing less the meteorological researches of the expedition than those descriptive, social, and geographical details collected under the general instructions of government to the commander, to make note of all information "of a useful character which there might be opportunity to obtain." The result has been highly commended; and as we have not seen the report in question, we use the facts chiefly confined to the republic of Chile, deduced therefrom by the writer in Putnam.

The territory of Chile forms a belt of about 2,000 miles long, and an average width of eighty miles. Situated lengthways between the Andes and the Pacific ocean, the arid desert of Atacuma forms its northern frontier, while the appalling storms of Cape Horn sentinel its southern extremity. Nearly one half of the territory to the south "seems to be little more than a mere selvage of rough country, crowded between the mountains and the rifted and iron-bound coast," which in many places join without any speck capable of habitation. The northern half, generally known as Chile proper, runs with an average of 100 miles into the land, is rough and hilly, but a series of fertile valleys between the base of the Andes and the seaboard hills, lying in the provinces of Santiago, Colchagna, and Maule, are productive, and in some portions, chiefly to the south of the northern division, or Central Chile, the olive and grape yield plenteously, but the sugarcane and other tropical plants do not succeed, for want of continuous moisture.

"In localities where this can be supplied, the native fruit-trees and a great variety of shrubs are ever green, but Lombardy poplars and other introduced trees retain their deciduous habits. It seems strange to read of their yellow leaves falling in May, and their boughs remaining bare during June and July, but this is only one of the features of this land, the reverse of our own country, not only in its position relatively to the equator, but to the continent and ocean. Maize is raised to some extent, barley succeeds well, and rye was introduced for the purpose of distillation; but, although the yield of the grain was good, its cultivation was abandoned, because the Chilenos preferred their own aguardiente, and would not take kindly to whiskey. Wheat is a great staple, and Chile flour was for a long time almost the sole supply of California."

The mountains of Chile are on the grandest scale. The base of the Andes is one hundred and twenty miles. The loftiest peaks in the territory are those of Aconcagua and Zupungato, the former of which looks down on Santiago from a height of 22,300 feet, the latter rising to 22,450. The very passes of this mighty barrier are higher than the most elevated peaks in Europe. The Uspullata pass, north-east of Santiago, is 12,500 feet high. The Poatillo, south-west of the same city, is 13,200; and after passing the mountain valley of Tunyan the pass attains the height of 14,475 feet. Come-Cavallo (eat-horse) pass is 14,500, and Dona Ana 14,900 feet above sea-level. The rivers, from the nature of the country, are "short, turbulent, and rarely navigable," the Biobio, the largest, being available for boats for less than fifty miles.

In the north, rain scarcely ever falls, fourteen days in a year being the average. More south, forty days is the ultimate. In the central country rains descend in May, June, July, and August, their winter months; and then summer season vegetation disappears. Further south, rains increase, 156 wet days being noted in a year; but the region is uncultivated, being held by "the warlike Aracaunian Indians." At Santiago, in the brief season of 1850, fifty-six inches of rain fell, and thirty-inches in 1851; quantities estimated as quite equal to rain-fall in New-York during a wet month.

The city of Santiago is situated 2,000 feet above the sea, sixty miles inland, in a vale or basin sixty miles by twenty in extent, of which it occupies an area of over six square miles. The houses are low, like most South American domicils; and the population is between 80,000 and 90,000. Lieut. Gilliss regards the climate as unfavorable to longevity. Few aged men are met with, and the census returns of 1854 show an increase of only three per cent in the population during six years—from 1,393,000 to 1,435,000.

The people are indolent and immoral, and the reviewer suggests that these causes may contribute as much as climate to the effect indicated by the figures. The Report states that out of less than 45,000 births, more than 10,000 were illegitimate; and the mortality among children, arising from neglect and other consequent causes, is very large.

The Report embraces deeply interesting details of the earthquakes so prevalent in Chile. That of 1835 is the most terrible. The towns of Concepcion and Talcahuano were destroyed, the ocean waves swinging ships in two hundred yards on the land, and in receding dragging everything with them. The island of Santa Maria, seven miles long, was bodily lifted nine feet, "together with the bottom of the sea around, so that in places where, in 1834, there had been thirty feet depth of water, subsequent soundings showed but twenty-one."

"The island of Mocha, seventy or eighty miles distant, was at the same time raised about two feet. The celebrated Juan Fernandez, 360 miles from the coast, was violently shaken, and a volcano burst forth through 200 feet of water, at the distance of a mile from its shore."

In concluding this rapid outline of the physical and moral stateof Chile, mention must be made of the especial laborer of the Expedition. Mounting his observatory on Santa Lucia, a hill 175 feet high, on the eastern side of Santiago, an examination of the heavens was made through more than 24 degrees declination. Thirty-three thousand observations of some 23,000 stars were obtained, 20,000 of which were not previously tabulated. Much time was devoted to the northerly zones of the sky, which, with observations of the moon, planets, &c., number about 9,000 measures."

"Lieut. Gilliss," says Putnam, "had hoped to have tabulated all the stars not clearly visible above the horizon of Washington, so that, by combining the labors of his expedition with those of our national observatory, it might be said that the American Navy had mapped the whole of the heavens; but the numerical force of his corps was insufficient for the task."

A separate work, containing the valuable results of the extensive astronomical labor of the party, will be published.

LONDON LITERARY GOSSIP.

Hamilton & Co. have published a very readable volume, the Memoirs of Frederick Perthes; or, the Literary, Religious, and Political Life in Germany, from 1789 to 1843. This is an ambitious title, which the work only partially fulfils. Nevertheless, it is full of interest to all who wish to know, from a spectator and actor in that great drama, in which Napoleon Bonaparte played the chief character. Perthes took a very prominent and energetic part against the wonderful Corsican, and he was one of the ten who were made exceptions to the general pardon which Napoleon granted on the capitulation of Hamburg. A circumstance which gave him considerable pride and pleasure.

Perthes is chiefly known as the John Murray, or James Harper of Germany, for, with the exception of a Leipsig publisher, Perthes was one of the most extensive of the whole Teutonic race.

After the vivid scenes he describes of the Continental war, we consider his little glimpses of some of the most celebrated authors he met, are the most pleasant. His account of Jean Paul Richter is graphic. He says, "I went at 8 o'clock to see him—he is a tall, strong, bony figure, like a farmer or a forester; he was dressed in a hunting-coat, with a badger's skin over his shoulder, and leading a white Poodle by a string." After spending two days with him, he says, "I did not hear him utter one significant word—one deep thought—his conversation was throughout wearisome and obscure."

This lack of conversational power is very common in great writers. The man who uses his pen much, loses in proportion the use of his tongue, and vice versa, great orators are seldom brilliant writers. Richter's narrative of the manner in which he passed his time is amusing. "I rise at 5 in summer and 8 in winter. I walk about half a mile to an old woman's house, and take my white poodle with me. I carrry my papers and a bottle of wine in my badger's skin—there I work and drink wine till about one o'clock—then I give over drinking till five, when I drink as much beer as I can till seven o'clock."

Two hours of Lager Biering is enough, in our opinion, to spoil all the philosophy in the world.

Speaking of Niebuhr, the famous historian, he says, "For five days I spent several hours every day with him. Our conversation was almost entirely political. Niebuhr's disposition is very melancholy—the purer his heart, the deeper his sensibilities, the more he feels the want of some firm support for his soul—he fights with uncertainty and quarrels with life. He said to me, 'I am weary of life, only the children bind me to it.' He repeatedly expressed the bitterest contempt for mankind. In short, his out-pourings alternately elevated and horrified me."

A few pages after, we have a pleasant memorandum of a visit he made to A. W. Schlegel. "At first he gave me a stately reception, but the recollection of our ancient friendship soon made him open, tender and natural in his conversation. Alluding to Niebuhr, he expressed himself very candid as to their estrangement. 'Niebuhr,' said he, 'has no ground for this hostility; he is, however, so angry with my criticism on his Roman History that he will not now even see me. This is most unjust, for no one has made such determined effort, to follow his minute investigations. He ought to have forgiven me a few witticisms and jests, for he knew it was my nature; but so it is in Germany, nobody understands criticism.' We then talked about Voss and his translation which he thus disposed of: 'Voss has enriched our literature with a stony Homer, a wooden Shakspeare, a leathern Aristophanes.'" Talking of Schlegel, Perthes says, "Everybody talks of his vanity, but it lies so on the surface, that one can hardly suppose it sinks deep. Good-natured he certainly is, if not exasperated or tempted by a sally of wit." Upon Perthes urging him to bring out a new edition of his works, he declined, on the grounds that he had so intermixed his own essays with his brother's, and that they now so differed in their opinons, that it would look like an act of hostility to him.

The volume is full of excellent matter, and deserves an American publisher. The subject of it died at Gotha about twelve years ago, full of years and honor.

Longman's have published a new translation of The Odes of Horace, by Acker Robinson.

A Wicklow gentleman of the name of John Collins, has written, and actually published a poem on the Fall of Man.

A Mr. Absolon has also chosen a strange subject for a poem. It is founded on the Arctic Voyages, and is in seven parts. We are afraid the public will give it a freezing reception, or the cold shoulder. Still, with the thermometer at 96, it is pleasant to read of being wedged in between Icebergs, and washing your face by rubbing it with a piece of ice.

James Ballantine, a relative of the James Ballantine, has perpetrated a volume of Poems, which are very Scotch, and very simple. We give a nursery song:

Come awa, bairnie,
For your bawbee,
Rosy cheekit apples,
Ye shall hae three;
A sae fou o' hinney,
They drappit frae the tree,
Like your bonnie sel,
A' the sweeter they are wee.

Murray has just issued Dr. Balfour Baikie's Exploring Voyage up the Rivers Niger and Tsadda in 1854, and added a valuable Map. In order to accommodate the rivers to the steamer, the Plesid only drew seven feet of water; but so shallow are the rivers occasionally, that even this draught was too much, and the vessel repeatedly stuck in the mud. He says, "Let the reader fancy the schooner surveying a-head between groves of Mangroves, or Palms, or little Banana plantations. The canoes glide by with loads of Palm Oil. Ashore are tattooed savages, in striped calicoes, who come out of their huts to offer us fowls, or goats, or cocoa-nuts, happy to have in exchange bottles, brass snuff-boxes, and bright handkerchiefs. The weather is showery, and a green island covered with rich vegetation glitters in the stream. One of the most curious chapters is the description of the submerged village and its amphibious inhabitants. After sixteen weeks' sojourn in the unhealthy rivers of Africa, he returned to Fernando Po, thankful that they had all returned alive, and after very little suffering, considering the climate.

Longman & Co. have just published a Survey of the Religious and Scholastic learning of the Jews, by J. W. Etheridge. This is intended as an introduction to the study of Hebrew Literature. The critics pronounce it a valuable addition to Jewish Literature, but by no means a complete manual.

Blackwood & Sons have gathered together in a volume some of the contributions to Blackwood's Magazine, from the pen of the Rev. Mr. Eagles, who signed his contribution Sketches. For five-and-twenty years this amiable man and clever artist contributed papers on a variety of subjects to "old Ebony," and we have here a few of them.

The great book of the season is Tocqueville's State of Society in France before the Revolution in 1789, and of the causes which led to that event. This is admirably translated by Reeve, and published by Murray. Strange enough, it was the same Mr. Reeve who translated De Tocqueville's celebrated work on American Democracy twenty years ago.

Owing to the strict supervision now brooding over the French press, the author is obliged to be very guarded in his remarks; but he has managed to make the inferences so plain that every reader, more especially a French one, can draw them. The delicate art of Insinuation the countrymen of Voltaire understand better than any nation, and M. De Tocqueville has availed himself of this faculty in the present work. He brings out in very bold relief the anomalous condition of France in 1750, when really it was governed most despotically by Thirty Intendants, who were armed with power of Life and Death. As this work is sure to be published in this country we shall make no extract from it, although it is full of glittering passages.

Bentley has issued "a matter-of-fact Romance," called "It is never too late to mend." The author is Charles Reade, and it reaches to the orthodox extent of three volumes. It turns upon the adventures of a young farmer, who, repulsed by his lady-love's father on account of his poverty, emigrates to Australia. Of course, he makes a fortune, returns and weds his old flame.

The Athenæum has an article headed American Books, and contains reviews of several which have lately been republished in London. Among those thus complimented are, Mrs. Livermore's "Quadroon's Triumph," T. S. Arthur's "Good Time Coming," and "The Old Homestead," by Ann S. Stephens. Upon this unhappy votary of the pen the Athenæum pours out its fiercest bile. We spare the fair writer's feelings. Perhaps Dr. Griswold will publish it to oblige her. The bilious editor, however, makes the amende honorable to American authoresses by praising Mrs. Kinzie's "Wau Bun." This is sorry comfort for the lovely writer of "Fashion and Famine."

OUR STEAM NAVY—THE NIAGARA.

Wearied with the dust of the city, we accepted an invitation from a learned friend to pay a visit to the Dock Yard at Brooklyn. After a short walk through the classic regions of Rosevelt street, we went on board the ferry-boat, and soon touched the soil of Long Island, and scraping the acquaintance of two of its savage inhabitants, we made them understand our want, and were guided to York street, when one of them, telling us "to follow our nose till we came to the Dock Yard," they gave a savage yell, and disappeared into a lager bier wigwam.

We soon came to the much-vaunted spot, and entered, passing a few of our gallant soldiers, one of whom was playing with his own whiskers, and another was pulling a dog's tail as though it belonged to him.

We first stopped to admire the heaps of cannon balls, which looked like monster pills made up to fit a cannon's mouth, ere they are fit to be administered to man.

From these agreeable specimens of human progress, we had our attention called to a neat white cottage, with an admirably arranged garden, which we understood was the residence of the Commodore, who is Superintendant of the Dock Yard. Mentally resolving that it was a very desirable berth, we entered the Engineer's office, and inquired for Mr. Murphy, who is the chief of that department. Mr. Richards, his assistant, received us, and after a few minutes' conversation—by which we discovered he talked our language like a native—we were introduced to the chief, who commissioned his aid to show us all the wonders of the spot. We paid a flying visit to the Museum, which is now merely the nucleus for a great collection. It has, however, some great curiosities; among others an Egyptian mummy, in an admirable state of preservation, and so cut open that at one glance the system of embalmment is developed. The plan is to have one-half of the swathing cut down to the body itself, leaving half of it bare. The covering is about two inches thick, and seems as solid as though it were a mass of woven material. It is quite black from the effects of time, and there is nothing but a thick skin and gum on the bones! A thousand reflections rushed over our brain as we gazed upon it! It was one of the gentler sex? Alas! that skeleton, now open to the gaze of all, was once covered with flesh, throbbing with blood, and a skin soft as velvet, and glowing with the rosiest health. Possibly this might have been the sister of Pharaoh, or the very princess who took Moses out of the bulrushes; or else Potiphar's wife herself! We turned away, wondering where we should be in three thousand years, and what our gentle readers would do without us!

Turning away from this memento mori, we encountered a kind of cord coat of armor, which would resist the sharpest sword. There is a stain of dark fluid from the throat down, which Mr. Richards informed us was the blood of its occupant, and who had his throat cut by some unpleasant-minded savage! Turning away with a Christian shudder from this evidence of man's inhumanity to man, we bent our steps to the new steamer of war the Niagara. It does not require an American to be proud of this sea monster; every lover of science—every admirer of beauty—every sympathizer with Human progression, cannot fail to be impressed with this marvellous triumph of Ingenuity and Intellect. Such are its symmetrical proportions that, although 345 feet in length, it looks much smaller, and yet, standing in the dock, it appears to be a street. The deck is a flush one, and seems as solid as the Russ pavement of Broadway. It is pierced for only twelve guns, but these are of the caliber of the Peace-Maker, which will carry 86 pounders. Upon descending, we were struck with the height between decks, which will allow the tallest man to walk with his hat on. The cabins are well arranged, and provided with baths and every convenience. The great wonder, however, is the steam machinery. The boilers are immense; the engine is really a stupendous affair, and seems a mass of solid iron, capable of resisting the steam of a combined world of kettles! A very large political meeting might be held in them, if it were safe to trust such inflammatory materials even in iron! After a short conversation with Mr. Stears, the builder, we descended the side and left the official precincts of Brooklyn, feeling assured that, should the honor of the Republic require it, the thunders of the steamer will equal those of the cataract, and that our new wonder of the deep will prove worthy of her name.

MARRIED, NOT MATED; or How they Lived at Woodside and Throckmorton Hall. By ALICE CARY, Author of "Clovernook," "Lyra, and other Poems," &c. Derby & Jackson.

Anything Miss Cary writes is worth reading, for she has as distinct a position in American literature as Brockden Brown, Edgar Poe, Gilmore Simms, Herman Melville, or any of those writers who, possessing an analytic sympathy with the actualities of life, and drawing inspiration largely therefrom, build up fictions which startle at once by the naturalness of the sketching as by the imaginative coloring that fills up the picture. Alice Cary won her first laurels as a poet, and had scarcely commanded recognition in this respect, when the publication of the charming sketches entitled "Clovernook" gave her prominent position as a prose-writer of great originality, power, and picturesqueness of expression.

The contemplative nature of Miss Cary's mind adds a lasting charm to her works, though it lessens the possibility of her making what is known in publisher's circulars as a "sensation book"—a form of work which is only known by advertisement, and is not far removed in style and character from the announcement by which a combination of stupid love-scrapes and midnight murders, hard-hearted money-changers and soft-headed dandies, broken hearts, broken heads, broken English, aristocratic grocers and antiquated stalks of the cabbage trade, jumbled up together, with as little regard to the feelings of all as possible, and wrapped in vulgarity, slang, and ambitious "fine writing," is palmed off as the truest picture yet given of American life and manners. If Dickens, Marryatt, or any other male or female Trollope, wrote such a work on life in the Republic, the whole community would boil and hunger for the scalp of the aforesaid Dickens, Marryatt, or Trollope. But as

> "That in the captain's but a choleric word, > Which in the soldier is flat blasphemy," so we suppose American authors only show their ingenuity and harmlessness of spirit, while foreigners are only capable of downright vulgarity, and a desire to insult, in writing of American society.

Talking on this subject with a shrewd John Bull not long since, he laughed heartily at our warm denunciation of the English works alluded to, and brought up as evidence of their truthfulness a late "sensation book," which had sold some forty or fifty thousand.

"You talk," said he, "of Dickens' and Mrs. Trollope's making fun of, and abusing society here, when they knew so little of it; why, here's the author of this, (holding up "sensation,") who is a born Yankee,—(the English call all the Americans Yankees)—lived with them all his days, and makes them more contemptible than Trollope or Dickens could, had he lived here for the same space of time. The book is positively revolting; and if society is any thing like this book's representation of it, then the Americans ought to be obliged to my countrymen for treating them so kindly." He said much more than we care to call to mind now; but we could not be blind to the very serviceable shaft of satire he flung at the debasing school of writers which has arisen within a few years, and is killing the sensibilities of young readers by exciting them too much, or stupifying them beyond recovery. These "sensation books" are worse than an epidemic, and do more injury to the community.

As things not unfrequently suggest their opposites, we were led into this digression by the wholesome contrast afforded by Miss Cary's writings to the books we have alluded to.

The plot of "Married, not Mated" is simple almost to a fault; but the manner in which it is written is admirable, and the characters are evidently the effect of close observation—studies from the life. The "Woodside" story is melancholy, the heroine being a heartless woman beyond her prime, who marries to get free from a miserly father and a cheerless home. The man she marries loves her devotedly, but she cares nothing for him, and only "takes him" when she had failed to entrap a foolish, frivolous, heartless and blasé brother of his, a surgeon in the army, into marriage. Her character is strongly contrasted with that of her sister, a young, lovely, trustful girl, whose attention to her old widowed father, and whose pining into the grave, are delineated with that deep poetic feeling which Alice Carey so loves to cultivate.

In the story of Throckmorton Hall there is a great deal of life and humor. The "Married, not Mated" idea is illustrated in the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Throckmorton, who, though they existed in harmony, happiness and wealth, were as ill-mated as the Grahams, their Woodside neighbors. Mrs. Throckmorton is a weak-minded, adoring, simple and servile slave of her husband, who has a great respect for her as the wife of Mr. Peter Throckmorton, but is utterly incapable of valuing her never-ending solicitude about him. He feels himself a great star, and thinks it highly commendatory of her good sense that she is a satellite. An ignorant, vain, self-sufficient, selfish man, his own opinion of himself is only matched by his wife's regard for his necessity to the wide earth; and she evidently deems it a matter of wonder that Providence should have allowed her to be related to so eminent an individual. She loves Peter to absolute foolishness. Peter is aware that a wife ought to love her husband—that it is her duty—that she owes it to him—and consequently receives her affection as a Jew does a debt. He lent her his name as a Jew does his money; and has an idea that no amount of interest, however exorbitant, could thoroughly indemnify the act. They are both, with all the incongruities peculiar to them, set before the reader with real and unaffected power.

The other characters are not less ably sustained, especially that of Rache. Good-natured, quick-witted, out-spoken, restless, honest, Rache is a type of that class of the children of labor who, dependent from infancy almost, job and work around for a livelihood—the variety of servitude grafting a variety of mannerisms on the natural observant mind, until they grow to manhood or womanhood with a rough knowledge of everything and everybody, capable of astounding the oldest inhabitant of any place, and with an adaptability at once serviceable to their employers, and actually the strength by which the frontier towns of a few years back have been extended into flourishing interior cities.

The descriptions of scenery in the work are very fine, and tell of that deep appreciation for the thoughtful, the beautiful and the grand, which, bursting into voice in the Far West of the Republic, has made Miss Carey a welcome favorite in any and every corner of the Republic of Letters.

"Putnam's Monthly" (September) opens with a serviceable paper on the late United States Astronomical Expedition to the Southern Hemisphere, which we notice more at length elsewhere. There are several excellent papers in this number, nearly every one of which are of more than ordinary merit, and ably sustain the literary character of the magazine. "The Poetry of War" is especially worthy of attention, being a sketchy, but erudite review of the modes of warfare, from the time when the children of Greece were "born in the buckler," down to our own day, when Thomas Davis, with his passionate sympathy for the beautiful and his clarion voice for upholding the right, sounded the hopes of many when he sung,

> "O for a steed, a rushing steed,
> And a blazing scimetar,
> To hunt from beauteous Italy
> The Austrian's red hussar!"

The writer, with appreciative brevity, justly regards Davis as "one of the finest spirits of the age." "Weimar in 1826" is a slap-dashy chapter of a student's dash through the city Goethe made famous by living in, and Napoleon made more famous by visiting. The narrative runs along at full speed, and seems as though written in a railcar, the writer attempting to prove that his pen could fly faster than the locomotive. However, it is a pleasant paper. The author had an audience with Goethe, and thus knocks his face of in a minute:

"Goethe's face was oval, with grand harmonious lines, and features large and prominent, hair cut short and gray without baldness, forehead high and roomy, largely developed throughout, and swelling in the upper corners, so as to unite in a fine curve the conspicuous organ of wonder and ideality."

"Going to Mount Katadin" is a hearty account by a lady, of a hearty time, roughing it through and enjoying the country. The writer tested the truth of a saying she once heard, that such an excursion would give "better fun than a trip to Saratoga," and her conclusion is a sensible one, to wit—"that there is more real peril in a week of ball-room than in a month of bivouac."

"The Battle of Wilo-Wilo" is a humorous narrative of ludicrous adventures with Chinese pirates. Scampavias is continued. There is a sixteen-page article devoted to an "Historical sketch of the Jesuits," which appears to be impartial and well-informed, but as we have barely glanced at it, (having marked it for special perusal), we cannot say distinctly whether it be thoroughly one or the other. The editorial notes are very good.

Literary and Artistic News.

Histories of Families of Ireland.—Mr. D'Alten, 48 Summer Hill, Dublin, author of several works connected with the general and family history of Ireland, has very recently published "Illustrations Historical and Genealogical. King James's Irish Army List, 1689." Eight volumes, 992 pages. It contains memoirs of 400 families who were represented in commission on that list—the old aristocracy of Ireland. The book is already out of print, and a new and enlarged edition is sought by many, who are at last contributing their ancient family papers and memorials to extend and verify the memoirs, and continue them to as recent a period as attainable. He is most desirous to undertake the labor and complete the record, if he is adequately encouraged by the early transmission of such manuscripts, with pedigree and old correspondence, to him at the above address. He confidently appeals to the press of America to facilitate his national object through that class of emigrants who have adopted other homes beyond the seas, but happily do not yet forget old Ireland.

That wonderfully successful romance "Uncle Tom's Cabin," was rejected in MS. by three of the leading Boston publishers. A then third-rate publishing firm took the book in hand, and realized in nett profits more than eighty thousand dollars from its sale. Fanny Fern, now Mrs. James Parton, received from her publishers some fifteen thousand dollars from the sale of a volume for which they would risk but eight hundred dollars. Mrs. P. was then poor, and the proffered sum was a sore temptation. But she withstood it to her very great advantage. No chance in the most uncertain lottery scheme, as experience has fully proved, can be more charged with risk than the publication of books by new authors, or those of unestablished reputation. A slip-shod life of Fremont has already realized to the lucky author and publishers twenty thousand dollars, so says the Cincinnati Sun.

At the recent commencement of Jefferson College, Pa., the degree of Master of Arts was conferred on the Rev. Charles Baird, of Yonkers, N. Y., and that of D. D., on the Rev. Dr. Tholuck, of Halle, is said to be now engaged upon a revision of his commentary on the Gospel of St. John, and has just completed the new edition of his sermon on the Mount, and the Epistles to the Romans. Among the foreign religious works announced, is the third volume of Alford's Greek Testament, with a revised text, &c.; a second edition of the Rev. Mr. Anderson's History of the Church of England in the colonies of the British Empire, in three volumes; a third edition of Bishop Wilberforce's History of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America; Lord Lyttleton's four Gospels and Acts, with notes; the Rev. Isaac Williams's Sermon on the character of the Old Testament; and the Rev. John Hannah's Discourses on the Principle of Scientific Interpretation and on the Fall.

Some new materials for the history of William Tell and his time has just been discovered in Zurich. They were found in "the Oldest White Book" written in the fifteenth century, which contains, beside copies of the oldest federal letters, a short chronicle of the earliest history of "the Three Cantons," and the story of William Tell of an earlier date than that of Melchior Russ. This is most probably the source of Gilg Tschudy's version, which he made use of and embellished.

Wm. T. Porter, Esq., for about five-and-twenty years editor of the New York Spirit of the Times, a weekly journal, greatly popular with sporting men all over the world, has commenced Porter's Spirit of the Times. He is assisted by Mr. Herbert, and other writers, and will produce a publication not to be surpassed in or out of this country. The new Spirit will be of the same size and character as the old one, and the brilliant circle of racy correspondents, whose wit and literary ability shone so brightly of old, will flash out with fresh vigor. It must be a great success, and we congratulate the editor on deserving it.

Dr. McElheran having finished his work on "Human Aborigines," is prepared, we learn, to give series or single lectures on this subject. His original investigations and colossal drawings of the Celtic and Germanic nations form the best illustrations of ethnology as yet presented to the public. The subject is daily becoming more popular and important. For the information of literary and scientific societies, we give Dr. McElheran's address —136 Macdougal st., N. Y.

The Charleston Courier, of the 18th inst., says of Harriet Martineau:—This strong-minded cousin has condescended to enlighten the English public, out of her abundant knowledge, by a pamphlet of thirty-five pages, on the "History of American Compromises." She knows about as much as such meddlers generally do, and this need not be a matter of surprise. While traveling in and through this State, she was indefatigable in pumping all sorts of private details and domestic revelations out of house-servants, while enjoying the hospitalities of their masters.

The Rev. Dr. Maitland, in his recently published essay on "False Worship," contends that the intermarriage of the sons of God with the daughters of men, related in Genesis sixth chapter, is the source of all the forms of Pagan worship. The Rev. Dr. argues that the Giants, which were the fruits of this union, were the first objects of this false worship.

American News.

The Memphis (Tenn.) Evening News learns the particulars of an affair which lately occurred at Middleton, Hardeman county, which but for its timely discovery might have resulted in the horrible massacre of a whole family. On that night, Mr. J. B. Jones was awakened by the barking of his dogs, and getting up to ascertain the cause of the disturbance, after lighting a candle, he discovered a negro man in a perfectly nude state, rifling the contents of a trunk in the house. Mr. Jones got his gun and fired at the negro, the charge passing under his arm, and blistering him severely. The boy then ran, but being set upon by the dogs, was soon captured, but escaping from his captors, he was not caught again until the next day (Friday), when he proved to be a runaway, known as "Wild Bill," who has been in the woods for about eighteen months. On being arrested, Bill disclosed a conspiracy between him and Mr. Jones' negroes, to kill Mr. Jones and his wife, and then rob the house, and make their way to a free country. Their plan was, for Bill to enter the house and kill them by shooting with the gun; and should this fail, the purpose was to be accomplished by Mr. Jones' negro, by means of poison. Both the negroes were arrested, and confined in the Bolivar jail.

The contractor and agent of the Tehuantepec Company arrived this morning, says the New-Orleans Delta of the 26th ult., from Vera Cruz, by the Texas, and reports that the work has commenced on the road from Suchil, and is now been vigorously prosecuted from that point towards the Pacific. From the Pacific towards that point, the contractor, Colonel Smith, has in his employ, independently of laborers from the United States, five hundred natives employed on the work; and the Colonel expresses his surprise and gratification at the success which has attended thus far the employment of native laborers. With regard to the details of the work on this important road, and business connected with it, we expect shortly to give much fuller intelligence. Meanwhile we are gratified to learn that the work offers every promise of early completion, the contractor being sanguine that as early as December the road across the Isthmus will be in a condition to travel over with wagons, coaches, and similar conveyances.

Although the United States has but little over twenty-six millions of inhabitants, ten millions less than France, and nine millions less than the German Zollverein, still in one article of trade with Southern Asia, it outdoes these more populous countries of civilized Europe. In the year 1851, England carried 65,100,000 pounds of tea from China to Europe, and 9,304,000 pounds to India and Australia; the United States exported from China 34,327,000 pounds. Holland 3,000,000 pounds; and other nations 3,000,000 pounds, while Russia carried 14,000,000 pounds by land.

An exchange says that one vote in the United States Senate annexed Texas to the United States. Mr. Hannegan, of Indiana, cast that vote. One vote in the Indiana Legislature elected Mr. Hannegan to his place in the Senate. That vote was cast by Madison Marsh of Staunton county. Mr. Marsh was chosen to the Legislature of Indiana by one vote.

In 1729 Bishop Berkeley paid a visit to this country, and preached at Newport. He wrote home that "the town of Newport contains 6,000 souls, and is the most thriving place in all America for bigness." For 150 years from the arrival of the first emigrants, Newport and Boston were the chief cities of New England, and in commerce each of them was superior to New-York.

The Albany Knickerbocker says there is a boy not over fourteen years of age, stopping at one of the Hotels in that city, who keeps a trotting horse and buggy, bets high "with the best of 'em," smokes a dollar's worth of cigars a day, drinks juleps and cobblers innumerable, struts about with the fashionables, and orders his bottle of champagne regularly at dinner. He says he has a fortune, and is making a tour of the United States.

The late storm caused great destruction at Catskill and vicinity. At Leeds, three miles above Catskill, Harris's Woolen Factory (employing 130 to 150 hands), with the machinery, has been carried away; the stone grain mill is demolished, and Dinger's paper mill nearly destroyed. The loss at Leeds is said to be all of $100,000. The loss altogether on the Hudson River will even exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. Brown editor of the Missouri Democrat, and Thomas C. The affair grew out of strictures made by Mr. Brown on Mr. R., during the state canvass.

A "Spiritual Retreat," says the Newark Mercury, was held by the Roman Catholic clergy of the diocese of Newark—comprising the whole State—at Seton Hall College at Madison. The exercises are said to have been conducted by the Rev. Mr. Walworth, son of ex-Chancellor of New-York, and a zealous member of the only order of Redemptionists in this country. We learn that a young American convert, of this State, to the Roman Catholic Church, will be ordained for the priesthood in St. Patrick's Cathedral, by Bishop Bayley.

It is reported, says the Boston Evening Ledger, that an Italian barber, who has been located at the North End, left his soap and razors very suddenly about a fortnight since, and departed from the city with $500 which he held in trust for some of his countrymen, and a woman who had sworn to be the virtuous wife of another man only a short time previous to her elopement. But the worst is not yet told. This Italian Figaro and Juan has left behind a boy who calls him father, and three young females have every reason to believe that they will soon add to the number of babies who had not been born had not the barber left his native Italy. While hoping that this terrible Turk may be condignly punished, we also congratulate the people of North End in having got rid of a character so dangerous to the peace of their families.

Seven persons are now confined in the Cinncinnati County Jail, under charge of murder in the first degree.

Three unknown bodies have been washed ashore at Dunkirk, supposed to have been passengers on the ill-fated Northern Indiana. One a man and the two others women.

The first armed vessel that ever passed into Lake Superior, at least within historical reach, was the U. S. steamship Michigan, which vessel recently passed through the Sault Canal into the Lake.

City News.

Some particulars of a gross outrage committed on the persons of two emigrants—Catharine Sullivan, of England, and Jane Muldoon, of Ireland—on the 23d ult., by Joseph Jackson and John Dixon, stevedores, aided by Richard Lewis, have come to light. It is stated that the men, under the plea of getting the girls, who had landed the day previous, a lodging house, enticed them to Brooklyn, and by force, there in Delano's United States Hotel and in the woods, accomplished their purpose.

The Latting Observatory and twenty other buildings in the vicinity of Forty-fourth street, were destroyed by fire on the morning of the 30th ult. The Crystal Palace was on fire several times, but was not materially damaged.

By a recent decision in the Supreme Court, a juror cannot be arrested on a civil process during the existence of the panel on which he is serving.

TRANSATLANTIC PACKET STATION.

Boston, Sept. 4th, 1855.

Dear Sir:—I am not a little pleased to see you give your warm and influential aid to the undertaking on foot for direct communication with Ireland. To me it has long been the most practical and patriotic movement for the advancement of the old country.

The immense benefit that would accrue by having direct communication, under proper superintendence, health, cleanliness, and proper food for the emigrant, outweighs all difficulties for the pure philanthropist, and is ample compensation for all the labor incurred.

Not a day transpires in my business, in which I do not see the most beautiful fabrics, English manufacture, sold in the city of Boston, which the Irish manufacturer had first to sell to English commission houses, realizing the smallest living profit, when, had they the proposed communication, and commissioned houses here instead of England, with our great South, West, and Southwest markets, they would realize honest profits, be enabled to pay living prices to their mechanics, and further, come in direct business transaction with the American people, learning the great go-aheadative principle and self-reliance from them, and teaching them, in return, that all the beautiful things in the world are not of English manufacture!

To me 'tis evident the majority of the American people are far from knowing the Irish people. Nor can they know them, while they receive every thing Irish—history, manufactures, fame, and character—rolled in the slough of British infamy, prejudice, and hate.

The American people cannot yet believe that Irishmen laid the foundation of British manufactures, and that, before the latter could succeed, the manufactures of Ireland had to be killed by British legislation. Besides, this thing has failed in your great city; British interests, wealth, and prejudice being against it. But, taken in hand by Americans and Irish-Americans, in such a location as Fall River, with a fine port, easy of access, and directly between New-York and Boston, promises more than a failure.

The undertaking is not only practical, but would be a good investment. I likewise understand the projectors are assured of freight in large quantities from Southern States, of tobacco, corn, and flax-seed. It would likewise draw many working men to those congenial States, where labor is abundant and better paid. Besides being patriotic, it will be giving the enemy of human rights a stab in the feeling point—her commercial interests. If you believe in it, send forth the expression of such faith to the people; ask them to come up to the work, and despite any and every opposition it will succeed.

Yours respectfully, Thomas O'Neil.

BUCHANAN AND THE PRESS.

The Cincinnati Daily Enquirer says the Black Republicans have, ever since the event occurred, manifested the most ardent desire to manufacture political capital out of the circumstance of Herbert, the California member of Congress, shooting Keating, the Irish waiter, in Washington. They lately got up a document headed the "Killing of Keating—An address from Irishmen of Washington city to the Irish of the United States," in which they charge upon the Democratic party the responsibility of his (Herbert's) acquittal, and appeal to Irishmen to vote, in consequence, for the Black-Republicans. The silly affair is being franked, in large numbers, all over the nation by the Abolition members of Congress. Unfortunately, however, a prompt extinguisher has been put upon the document by a large number of the signers, who have stated, in a card, that they were induced to put their names to the address by false representations as to its character; and they then proceed to exonerate the Democratic party from any responsibility in the acquittal of Herbert. They aver that "eleven of the jurymen are as hostile to the Democracy as they are to the Irish," and that that organization is more united in condemnation of the act than any other. Patrick M. Keating, a brother of the murdered man, heads this card, exposing the bogus and fraudulent character of the address.

The Editor of the N. O. True Delta, speaking of the increase of political bets, gives the ofdetails one which took place in his office thus:—The parties who made the bets on last Saturday, made us the stake-holders, and which we noticed on Sunday morning, met in our sanctum last evening, and renewed their betting discussion. The Fillmore man who is a gallant fellow, in the common acceptation of the term, and a triple F. Virginian at that, and is, besides, a strong personal friend of ours, fairly "darted," much to our regret. He wanted to withdraw his former bet of $5 to $100 that Fillmore would get the electoral vote of Alabama. The Buchanan man agreed to withdraw the bet, provided the Fillmore man would pay as a forfeit $4 95, and treat all present, numbering some ten or twelve. This the Fillmore man declined. The Buchanan man then offered to bet the Fillmore man $10 to $50 that Fillmore would not carry a single State in the Union. This the Fillmore man also declined, and agreed again to treat all hands, which he did, to get off from betting on elections.

At a late Democratic meeting in Brandon, Miss., Dr. M. C. Russell, late of Kilkenny, Ireland, made a speech. The Doctor expressed his surprise at being called for, but in return surprised his audience by a most tasteful, witty, and elegant address. The Doctor said that he could not help being born an Irishman, that the like calamity had almost overtaken J. C. Calhoun, and that General Jackson escaped being one by the skin of his teeth. The next November he expected to cast his first vote, but that should the success of the K. N. party have enabled them to have carried out their policy, he would have been in a land of freemen on a level with free negroes, with the privilege of making a little money. We thought while the Doctor spoke, what a commentary on K. N. policy. There he stood, a gentleman of superior education, manly and dignified bearing, talking in a style eloquent, fluent, witty. In a style that would not have shamed a Curran, Sheridan, or a Mitchel, and yet there is a respectable party in the land sufficiently bigoted and narrow-minded to drive him from the land, or at all events to refuse him an equality which merit should ever secure.

At a large and enthusiastic meeting lately held at Marysville, Ky., in support of Buchanan and Breckinridge, the Hon. James B. Clay, only surviving son of the immortal Harry of the West, advocated the election of the Democratic candidates in a thrilling and effective speech. The tenor of Mr. Clay's speech may be gathered from a brief extract:

I come to strike one blow for the Union, and there being no Whig organization, the only party of the Union is that of which Buchanan and Breckenridge are the candidates.

It is still a mooted question, says the Hartford Times, where Colonel Fremont was born. And another question is where he belongs to. At present he resides in New-York city, but many of the republican papers announce him as "of California."

The Camden Democrat (N. J.) says of Fremontism in that State: "It can't be crammed down the throats of patriotic Jerseymen. We predict that Fillmore will beat Fremont in every county in the State, and that Old Buck will beat the combined vote of the two."

The Livingston Union adds the following item of proofs as to Fremont's Romanism: "A gentleman of high respectability last week informed us that an Irish Catholic of Perry village, a Mr. McCade, a short time since received a letter from a brother Catholic of New-York city, enforcing the obligation of voting for Fremont because he was a Roman Catholic. The news "put life and mettle" in the Perry Catholics, and he is now doing all he can to induce those of his faith to vote for Fremont."

It is said that Governor Wise, of Virginia, intends to declare any one who permits his name to go on a Fremont electoral ticket guilty of contemplated treason to the State.

The Boston Traveller says of the letter of the Hon. Rufus Choate, in which he comes out for Buchanan: "It is by long odds the heaviest shot that has yet been fired in the campaign, and it goes booming and crashing through the timbers of the 'Republican' ship, in a way which will startle her numerous and gallant crew, and require the summoning of all hands to repair damages."

A new German paper has just started at Sandusky city, with Buck and Breck flying at the mast head. The abolition concern heretofore published there, is pretty generally suspended by the Germans in that region.

Col. Richardson, of Illinois, has written a letter to the editors of the Washington Union, contradicting the rumor that he (Richardson) had admitted that the Black Republicans would carry Illinois. On the contrary, the Colonel says, no man doubts that "Buck and Breck" will carry the State by a very large majority.

The St. Louis Herald says that a slop gatherer, who collects the slops from the hotels and private residences in that city, sold to a jeweler a few days ago $300 worth of silver spoons and other articles, which he has found from time to time in the slops.

At New Orleans on the 17th of August, only thirty-eight bales of new cotton had been received there thus far this season, while at the same date last season the receipt had reached eleven hundred and ninety-three bales!

Two doors in the capitol extension at Washington have cost the magnificent sum of $47,000.

Special Notices.

Caution to the Public.—To distinguish the genuine magnetic powder, for the destruction of insects, from poisonous imitations, it is necessary to examine the wrapper. See that four national medals—those of England, France, Belgium, and the United States—are engraved thereon. Be sure also that a lithographic fac simile of Lyon's signature appears both on the wrapper and label. This caution is necessary to protect the proprietor from fraud and the public from danger and disappointment. The leading scientific societies, and the first chemists of Europe and America, have pronounced the magnetic powder the only poisonous insect bane in the world, as well as the most effective and fatal means for the destruction of bed-bugs, roaches, fleas, ants, flies, moths, &c., that was ever prepared or sold. The proprietors of the principal city hotels endorse it. Come and see the testimonials of Prince Albert, ex-President Fillmore, and hundreds of the nobility of Europe, as well as the sovereigns of America. The magnetic pills, for the extermination of rats and mice, are endorsed with equal emphasis by all who have tried them. Call and see the medals, diplomas, government orders, scientific certificates, letters, &c., at the Central Depot, No. 424 Broadway.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter, giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a subscriber to Mr. O'Mahoney's translation of the Foras Feasa ar Erinn.

That is a book long wanted, and which the "Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Elliot Hudson had lived, it would have been accomplished. The old established house of Benziger Brothers, Eisiedeln, well known to many of the Hierarchy and the Rev. Clergy of the United States who have visited Switzerland, established this house in New-York four years ago, and they trust they will receive for the greatly increased advantages they offer, a continuance of that support, which for a period of over forty years has enabled them to build up, at the Pilgrimage of Our Lady of the Hermits (Einsiedeln) an establishment in which over four hundred persons are daily employed in the fabrication of the various articles that are used in the Church.

They desire particularly to call attention to their publications of PRAYER and DEVOTIONAL BOOKS, in German, French, Italian and Latin, consisting of over 200 different sorts. Being in immediate and constant intercourse with nearly all the principal publishers of Europe, they are enabled to offer a large assortment of standard THEOLOGICAL and LITURGICAL WORKS, among which are, the editions of Mechline, Paris, Ratisbone, &c., at exceedingly low prices.

Contemplate the Life of Mary!

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing in semi-monthly parts at 25 cents each and under the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

Archbishop of New-York,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

OF HER MOST CHASTE SPOUSE

St. Joseph,

AND HOLY PARENTS

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved, expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its general appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably. Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

The work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

INDUCEMENT.

Each subscriber to this splendid work will receive with the last number a magnificent Steel Engraving suitable for framing, of the

A NEW COOPER!

JUST PUBLISHED,

SARATOGA,

A TALE OF 1787.

A Romance of American Border Life. One volume, 12 mo., muslin, price $1 25.

American Novelists have of late confined themselves mainly to sketches of social and domestic life. They have aimed to produce miniatures and cabinet pieces rather than historical pictures. The author of "Saratoga" has chosen a large canvas, and has wrought with a bolder hand. By placing the scene of his story on what was then the verge of civilization, and portraying characters trained in all the exigencies of border life, he has constructed a narrative full of startling incident and thrilling adventure, without violating the probabilities of history. The bold, cautious woodsman, Sandy Brigham, the watchful, taciturn Indian, Catfoot, and wily, vengeful half-breed, Joe, will compare favorably with the best delineations in the "Leather-Stocking Tales" of the great American Novelist. Since Cooper put forth his earlier and better novels, no American author has written a work of this class possessing merits equal to this tale of life on the borders.

The title of this book gives us to know at once the nature of its contents. It abounds in incidents of an exciting character.

Letter from Louis Blanc—Horrible Treatment of French Political Prisoners at Cayenne.

To the Editor of the London Times:

Sir—In February, 1855, I received a letter that was signed as follows: "Fassiliez, a political prisoner, transported in June, 1848, and who has now been working for fourteen months, like many others among his fellow-sufferers, under a chain of forty pounds in weight, with a cannon ball at the end of it."

In that letter, dated "St. Joseph's Island of Despair, September, 1854," the gratuitous and unheard-of acts of barbarity were stated which are inflicted at Cayenne upon men belonging to all classes of society—artists, tradesmen, workmen, barristers, physicians, farmers, journalists, scholars—these men having been violently driven out of their country, not in consequence of any lawful judgment, but by the mere impulse of political passions. I was requested to lay before the civilized world the heart-rending details, which I did as far as my power went.

Since that period no change whatever appears to have taken place in the situation of those unfortunate people, who are subjected to forced labor (travaux forces) on a lonely rock, surrounded by the sea, at a distance of about 6,000 miles from their native land.

Six months ago a second letter was forwarded to me relating what follows:

"Every ship that comes from the pestilential stores of Cayenne brings the death of a new victim. The latest victim is Peret, some time Mayor of Beziers, a most generous hearted man, feeling acutely, while he was rich, that many of his fellow-creatures were perishing of hunger, and ready to spare neither his fortune nor his life to the cause of humanity. Having been deported to Cayenne, without trial, for resisting the coup d'etat of the 2d of December, he attempted, with six fellow-prisoners to escape from that living tomb. They put to sea at night in a boat. Two hours after they were driven on the rocks. Peret, entangled in his cloak, was drowned. The six others survived, but what an existence! For two days they lived on what shell-fish they could find on a desolate rock in the midst of the ocean that threatened every moment to overwhelm them. At last one of them resolved to risk his life for the rest. Seeing no succor come, he threw himself into the sea, and, after three hours' swimming, reached the land. Unhappily, the land was French Guiana. He could only save his life on condition of surrendering himself a prisoner. His five companions were rescued from the devouring sea only to be cast into another dungeon—tomb for tomb."

Now, sir, here is a third letter which has just reached me:

To M. Louis Blanc, those deported to Cayenne, with urgent request to make public this appeal:

Those deported to French Guiana make an appeal to the feelings of justice and humanity of all honest men, to whatever party they may belong.

At the very moment when so much is spoken in France of clemency and generosity, while so many families are lulling themselves with the hope of clasping to their hearts the dear ones whose absence they have so long lamented, the political victims are treated in French Guiana in a manner worthy of the darkest ages of barbarity.

It is certainly a painful task to unveil such an account of iniquity; but how is it possible to pass over in silence the unjust and cruel behavior of French officers towards their fellow-countrymen? Let it be known, therefore, that we are unspeakably tortured on the flimsiest pretences, while people, deceived by the solemn declarations of the French Government, think perhaps that every prison is open and that we are at liberty. Let it be known, for instance, that out of five men lately arrested for some talk it had been the fancy of some overseer to invent, two were tied to a stake and dealt with as the most vile criminals. On their being reluctant to submit to an ignominious punishment soldiers were called for, who, rushing upon the victims, bruised them with blows, tore off their beards, and, reckless of shrieks with which wild beasts would have been moved, bound them with cords so fast as to make the blood gush.

To relate all we suffer is more than we possibly can do. Our cheeks kindle with shame, and our hearts are bleeding. Suffice it to say that, while the French Government has its clemency cried up everywhere, there are Frenchmen in Guiana who do gasp for life. Nor are they allowed the sojourn of the Island of Despair, horrible as it is; barbarous administrators drag them violently on the Continent, to compel them to a labor of eight hours a day in the marshy forests, from which pestilential vapors are continually rising.

We refused to submit to this outrage upon laws, to this murderous attempt; we claimed promised liberty. The answer is "Death!"—a magnanimous answer, after the birth of a prince!

Is there, indeed, for us any other prospect but imminent death? With no proper food, no garments, no shoes, no wine since February last, is there any chance that we should be long able to bear both the influence of an exhausting toil and a deadly climate? Again, where is the law which assimilates political proscripts to galley slaves? From beneath the brutal force that weighs upon us, heaped up together, almost breathless, but strengthened by the courage we draw from the sacredness of our cause and our hope in the triumph of justice, we protest against the violence which is offered to us. May public opinion be moved at our misfortunes, and energetically rise against deeds so well calculated to bring to shame a nation reputed to be the most enlightened and civilized in the world.

Berbeje Alexandre, Gibert, Goret, Boudin, Jecegaly, Dalivie, Fernland, Soffroil, Pech, Guerard, Bonnassiolle, Salleles, Susini, Beaufour, Lacour, Bockensky, Lafond, Dime, Gustave, Pelletier, Dessalle, Bijoux, Dore, Raymod, Meuniere, Cayet, Casnac, Frison, Patdouani, Labrousse, Ailhaud, Davaux, Bivors, Perrimond, Chaudron, Priol, Chaudret, Caumette, Hollas.

These are the lines, sir, the insertion of which in your columns I earnestly request, not as a Republican—not even as a Frenchman—but as a man; for this is not a question of political feeling, it is one of simple justice and humanity. Let it be carefully remembered that the tortured victims are men who have never been tried by any lawful court, nor prosecuted by any form of law! It lies in your power, sir—as I said on a similar occasion—that the groan they utter from the place where they are, so to speak, buried alive, should be heard in the world of the living. The French press is gagged, and whoever has recently resided in France must of necessity know—as stated in a letter addressed by Mr. Aytoun to the most influential paper in this country—"that when the press is controlled by an arbitrary Government every species of injustice, jobbing, and oppression may be perpetrated, uncommented upon, and even unknown to the great majority of the population." Such being the case in France, the liberty of the English press remains the only possible resort for the oppressed to have the justice of their complaints at least examined. I apply, therefore, to the English press, and that all the more confidently since I read in The Times a few days ago: "The press is emphatically the representative of the people. If wisely directed it guards the interests of all classes and conditions of society, and has a right in turn to the sympathies and assistance of all."

I remain, sir, your most obedient servant,

August 23. Louis Blanc.

Interesting from Russia.

NOTE TO LORD PALMERSTON FROM THE RUSSIAN CABINET.

Berlin Correspondence of the London Times.

The Kreuz Zeitung is informed by a correspondent in London that in the early part of last week Lord Palmerston received a note from the Russian Cabinet, in which "The complaints of the English Government as to the manner in which Russia has carried out the stipulations of the treaty of peace meet with a complete answer. The note is described as taking one by one each fact of which the English Government makes a reproach, and in each case depriving it of all ground for complaint equally firm and happily. The note then expresses itself in general terms with reference to the mistrust shown by the English Government. It is said in it that Russia concluded peace in the full hope and expectation that confidence would fully and completely return; this expectation, however, could not be otherwise than completely disappointed by the distrustful policy that England had assumed. One passage is more particularly worth notice in the Russian note. The English Government had, it appears, on some occasion declared that if it could have known beforehand how Russia would have put the terms of peace into execution, it would have kept its troops six months longer in the Crimea. To this the Russian Cabinet answers, that would of itself have put an end to the peace."

RUSSIA'S PRESENT POLICY.

The following letter in the Hamburger Borsenhalle, from a correspondent in St. Petersburg, dated 18th inst., is well worth notice. I have hitherto found the writer of it well informed, and believe that it is correct in its statements:

"It is affirmed that this Cabinet has laid down for itself as the rule of its policy a wise moderation and reserve with reference to the internal politics of the States of Europe. The recent events in Spain, their results more particularly, have excited its attention to a very high pitch, and meet with universal approbation at Court. A similar acknowledgment has also not been withheld from the attitude and bearing of the Neapolitan Government and of the internal policy of Denmark. It is, however, incorrect to suppose that this Cabinet has in any way communicated to the respective Courts its approbation, disapprobation, or advice. This resolution of the Government, which meets also with the sympathy of the majority, is evidenced in the endeavors it is making to maintain a good understanding with France, and to consult the commercial interests of England by moderating the tariff. France's motives for not prosecuting the war further, men here know how to appreciate, and M. de Morny, Lord Grenville, and Count Esterhazy will have opportunities of remarking it. France has not made the tardy surrender of Kars, and the lighting up afresh of the lighthouse on the Isle of Serpents ground for a want of confidence in this Cabinet. All the attempts are in vain to justify the want of delicacy that England has shown in reminding Russia, at the very moment when an Ambassador from her to the coronation was about to show himself here, that Russian newspapers committed a mistake in 1855, when they affirmed that the Black Sea was a Russian sea. D'ailleurs, the events in the East will in no way deteriorate our relations with France, and the present Government will avoid, as much as Alexander I. did, exciting the ill-will of England by any measures adverse to the commercial interests of Great Britain. Measures have been already taken which evidence the serious intention of the Government to remove all unnecessary obstacles from commerce, as far as it is possible for it to go. In this respect I need only point to the reduction of the duties on sugar, which lately alarmed our manufacturers of beet-root sugar so excessively that the press received instructions to put a stop to its discussions about prohibitive and protective systems."

SPAIN—THE NATIONAL GUARD DISARMED.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says:—Disarmed throughout the whole of Spain, the much-vaunted National Guard still for a short time escaped dissolution. Even in Spain—that paradise of political renegades—a man so prominent as O'Donnell may hesitate a moment before veering completely round, and destroying that which, two years before, he had proclaimed a necessity, and contributed to create. There was talk of a modification, of a new National Guard on the most approved principle, composed of prosperous heads of families and considerable tax payers—such a body, in short, as, if it ever did muster with bellicose intent, could easily be dispersed by a few companies of sharp-shooters. But even such a phantom of the popular force found no toleration in certain quarters. Harmless as a fact, it would be unpleasant as a memento. Royalty must have smiles at its command, but it has always been considered that none which ever decked the face of Queen Isabella II. cost her a greater effort than those which she was at times compelled to bestow upon her faithful and loyal National Guards. So there is no cause for surprise that the Madrid Gazette contains a decree dissolving that body, and that to-day a semi-official correspondence from the Spanish capital says that the Ministry in this case has been compelled to yield to a power superior to its own. This last announcement is perhaps intended as an excuse for Marshal O'Donnell. We are to infer that he has sacrificed his own will (and the National Guard) to that of his Sovereign. If the latter was stubborn, he still had two alternatives—the convocation of the Cortes or resignation. Are we to suppose that the Court feels itself so powerful that it ventured to bid him resign or yield? The point in dispute being the suppression of the National Guard, it probably cost him no great effort to adopt the latter course.

Scarcely a week passes that the Spanish ministerial organs do not inform the world that the most perfect harmony reigns between the Crown and the Ministry, and also between the various members of the Cabinet. Such extraordinary iteration is impolitic, since it naturally leads many to suppose that the pretended harmony covers real discord.

ITALIAN AFFAIRS—WARLIKE PREPARATIONS IN PIEDMONT.

A letter from Turin, of the 22d August, says:—"Piedmont is arming and making warlike preparations, as if she were on the eve of a new collision. The fortifications of Alessandria and Casale are rapidly advancing. The troops are employed in constructing the works. Grand military manœuvres are about to take place, and the Minister of War has ordered the commanders of the military divisions and subdivisions to suspend the delivery of furloughs, in order that as many men as possible may be present under arms from the 1st of September to the 15th November, the period fixed for those manœuvres. General Trotti has assumed the command of the fortress of Alessandria."

Foreign Miscellany.

A Russian work on the siege of Sebastopol, by Major-General Bogdanowitch, contains some curious statistical details, of which the following are extracts:—He says the allied trenches including boyaux and the like, extended to the length of 110,000 paces (the pace or schritt is equal to about twenty-eight inches), whereas, the greatest extent of any previous known works of a similar nature never exceeded 20,000 paces. During the siege the allies employed 80,000 gabions, 60,000 fascines, and more than 1,000,000 sand-bags. Whereas, in ordinary sieges the usual average is from 10,000 to 15,000 gabions, the same number of sand-bags and 100,000 fascines. The author remarks, however, that this excess arose from the rocky nature of the ground, which rendered sand-bags more efficacious than fascines. He adds, that latterly the allies had 800 guns in battery, and that in all they fired 1,600,000 projectiles. When Gibraltar was besieged in 1781, he observes, the besiegers had not more than 230 guns on the land, and 192 on the floating batteries, and that the total number of shot fired did not exceed 270,000.

Prince Louis Lucien Bonaparte, who was at St. Sebastian when the insurrection broke out at Madrid, and who was desired by the Emperor to return to France, is about to re-enter the Spanish basque provinces with the object of studying their language, antiquities and history. He is anxious to compare the various dialects of the Bascuense, which are very numerous and differ widely from each other.

Rumors were prevalent of an insurrection in Sicily. It was stated that the Government at Naples, in consequence of some alarming news which was very carefully concealed from the people of Naples, hastily dispatched a couple of steam frigates towards Palermo. Malta papers contain no notice of any such revolt.

A letter from Turin, dated the 22d August, says that Piedmont is arming and making warlike preparations, as if they were on the eve of a new collision. The fortifications of Alexandria and Capuli were rapidly advancing. The troops were employed in constructing the works. The delivery of furlough was suspended, in order that as many men as possible may be present under arms from the 1st of September to the 15th of November.

The Spanish Gazette publishes a decree definitely disbanding the National Guard. The Government, it is said, will render an account of this measure to the Cortes next session. The same journal also publishes decrees dismissing seven civil Governors of Provinces, and appointing sixteen others, taken from among the Moderado and Progressista Parties.

The last man of the English in the Crimea is said to have been one of the Land Transport Corps, who long after the Crimea was given up and all had embarked was found lying very drunk in one of the ditches. He was carried to the beach by six Cossacks, and pulled off to the last ship leaving the port. So tipsy was he that he had to be hoisted on board.

The Swedish Government was engaged on plans for improving routes of communication for the commerce of the country; so also as to avoid the Sound dues. This is to be effected, it was said, by canal or railway, or both, from the North Sea to the Baltic, and by arrangements for transmitting merchandise direct between Lubec and Luneberg.

The Constantinople journals declare the union of the Principalities to be contrary to constitutional law. The Ottoman Cossacks were to be intrusted with watching the Greek frontier.

Accounts from Madeira are more encouraging. At Cintra several cases had appeared, and three deaths are reported among the Royal servants at the Palace, where the King is residing.

An attempt at insurrection was made in the Grand Duchy of Tuscany by thirty young men, who were speedily put to flight by the gendarmerie at Orbitello.

Irish News.

The Messrs. Waterhouse, of Dublin, have done wonders to revive the glories of ancient Irish art in their department of manufacture—jewelry, gold and silver. The Royal Tara Brooch is now of world-wide celebrity from the numbers dispersed over all lands. The history of this brooch formed the subject of a most interesting paper, read by Dr. Petrie at the Royal Irish Academy several years ago. In addition to this, various other patterns of antique brooches, found in various parts of Ireland, were copied and manufactured, creating quite a furore, from the period of the Great Exhibition in 1851 up to the present time. The same enterprising firm have now brought out the Royal Tara Bracelet—a graceful, simple and beautiful piece of ornamental jewelry. The bracelet folds around the arm in compartments, each of which bears upon it beautiful scrolls and figures, recognized as peculiarly Celtic and of unknown antiquity in this country, but supposed by the learned antiquarians to belong to the eleventh or early part of the twelfth century, when the arts were carried to the highest perfection in this country. The bracelet is of gold and oxodized silver ; the happy admixture of the two metals forms a highly pleasing contrast. The manufacturers deserve the highest credit for the masterly style in which it is executed.

It has several times, says the Wexford Independent, been our pleasing duty to mention instances of kind remembrance of Old Wexford shown by Wexfordmen, though separated from their birth-place by wide oceans. Some whose lot in life is cast in foreign lands, where they have found a new home and a heritage, have sent souvenirs to mark their remembrance, and offered them for deposit in the Mechanics' Institute Museum. The value of a gift depends more on the manner of giving it, and the intention of the giver, than on the intrinsic price of the thing. These remarks have been drawn from the Independent, on reading the following :—" Presented to the Mechanics' Institute, by Mr. James Murphy, ship-carpenter, through Mr. Geo. Codd, three Minie rifle balls, one canister shot, one fusee, and 2 Russian tobacco pipes got in the Redan, a helmet of the 26th regiment with the Russian eagle displayed on it, and a manuscript journal," as it appears to be from its tabular form, containing some very fine writing, all in the Russian character, taken from the burning ruins of Sebastopol—the edges of the leaves being somewhat burned. Mr. Murphy, the donor, a Wexford man, was carpenter on board the transport ship " Lady Russell" in the Black Sea.

A thunder-storm swept over Killucan three weeks ago. It began at 3.40 p. m., and lasted nearly an hour. The hailstones, many of them resembling blocks of ice, were very large. They were of different shapes and sizes. Some were opaque at one end, and pellucid at the other ; some opaque in the centre, and clear as crystal on the outer portion ; some were round, others oval, and others apparently fragments of blocks of ice. The largest of the globular, though much reduced in size from the time they had fallen, were three inches in circumference, by three and a half in the small. So intense was the cold of the hail or ice, that it remained on the ground hours after the storm had passed over.

At the last meeting of the Limerick Sailor's Home Committee, in the Chamber of Commerce, the Mayor presided There were two tenders for the building of the Sailor's Home, one from Mr. Patrick M'Namara, for £960, and the second from Mr. G. Hunt, C. E., for £1144. It was resolved, after some discussion, to take Mr. M'Namara's tender into consideration. Mr. Robinson, Mr. Ryan, and the Mayor were appointed trustees of the committee, and authorized to sign agreements of tenders as required by the Board of Works, and to enter into engagements for building the Home.

An occurrence lately took place at the Parish chapel at Blackrock, near Cork, which might have produced very disastrous consequences. While last Mass was being celebrated, a piece of the ceiling, not half a foot square in dimensions, fell, and having made a little noise, excited the terror of the people, who rushed in a body up the aisle of the chapel, crossed into the sanctuary, and many of them dashed out through the vestry-room. Fortunately, however, the disturbance was put an end to without any serious damage being done beyond one or two ladies falling into fainting-fits.

At Callan (Co. Kilkenny) Petty Sessions, the Excise recently brought a charge against Mr. Corr of that town, for having sold spirits under regulation proof to the Callan Board of Guardians, and having sent it to the Workhouse without a certificate. In consequence of the conflicting evidence, the magistrates suggested that the issue should be tried before the Assistant-Barrister at Quarter Sessions, and made a rule of dismiss without prejudice.

Major T. Dillon, of the late 2d Royal Veteran Battalion, died on the 31st of August, at Summer Cove, aged 77 years. He served in the Irish rebellion ; in Holland, under the Duke of York and Sir Ralph Abercrombie ; also, in the campaign of Egypt in 1802, and was present at the different actions that took place in that country ; also, at Corunna under Sir John Moore, and at the action at Lugo.

In one of his sparkling letters to the Warder, Terry O'Driscoll says, it's only another added to the thousand and one illustrations of cause and effect, as Mr. Rooney remarked to the talkative young lady, who, after hearin' him sing the "Meetin' o' the Waters," kept inquirin' how Tom Moore could be certain "there was not in the wide world a valley so sweet." "The only reason I can assign," replied the persecuted singer, "is the fact of its bein' in the same county with the Sugar-loaf."

The festival of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin has been commemorated with peculiar devotion in Kilkenny. High Mass was celebrated in St. Mary's Church. The Rev. E. Rowan acted as High-Priest, the Rev. Mr. Hennessy, as Deacon, and Dr. Mc Donald, as Sub-Deacon. The Rev. E. Walsh, in the course of a very eloquent discourse, complimented the Chief Magistrate, the Mayor of the city, on his successful efforts in opposition to Souperism.

The amount of the National Debt of England on the 31st of March last was £775,314,694 on which the annual interest is £23,267,361. During the year ending at that date the stock created by loans was £221,555,416, and by funding the Exchequer bills, &c., £3,352718, involving an annual interest of £747,243.

Nearly all the corn about Rathkeale is being cut down. The streets of the town are literally crowded with Kerrymen, come to reap the harvest, and are to be seen every evening "footing it" in their shirt-sleeves to the tune of " Tather-Jack-Welsh" or some other equally appropriate air in the public street.

Mr. William M'Cormick, the eminent contractor, has taken the contract of finishing the railway from Clones to Enniskillen, before the 1st of August, 1857. In twelve months there will be continuous railway communication between Dublin, Enniskillen, and Londonderry. An Act of Parliament has also been obtained for connecting Sligo with Enniskillen by railway. This line will also be pushed on. The branch from Monaghan to Cavan will connect the Port of Dundalk with Ballinasloe and Galway. It will, in fact, complete the net work of railways between the North of Ireland, the West, and even the South. It will be possible to go from Dundalk to Cork and Waterford, via Mullingar, by railway.

At Fermoy Petty Sessions, two weeks since, Captain Briggs, 82d regt., and Captain M'Kenrick, 33d, were fined £5 and costs for committing a violent and aggravated assault upon two watchmen of the town. It appears that the defendants, about two o'clock in the morning of the 20th ult., commenced to roll a barrel they found lying in the street, when the watchmen desired them desist from disturbing the neighborhood. One of the gallant gentlemen caught one of the complainants by the collar, and held him, while the other rolled the barrel against his legs.

On the evening of the 8th of last month, two men named John Reynolds, and William Egan, returning to Clara, King's County, from Monte, where they had been carrying part of the baggage of the 59th Regiment, were attacked at Woodfield, within one and a half miles of Clara, by four or five men, who beat Egan very severely, and Reynolds in a brutal manner. The persons concerned, will be brought before the magistrates at Clara petty sessions.

In 1847, a sum of not less than £1,000 was placed at the disposal of the Conference of St. Vincent de Paul, Cork, by their brethren in France. Now, that the French require assistance to alleviate the miseries caused by the recent inundations, the Conference of St. Finn Barr has considered the present a favorable moment to give testimony of their gratitude, and their earnest desire to reciprocate the charity so liberally bestowed in the time of the Irish famine.

An influential deputation of noblemen and gentlemen connected with the west of Ireland, waited lately, at Moydrum Castle, upon the Lord Lieutenant, to lay before his Excellency a memorial on the subject of railways in Connaught, and to convey their desire that he would use his influence with the proper authorities in London, to have removed the difficulties interposed by the standing orders of parliament. After considerable discussion, the Lord Lieutenant, in dismissing the deputation, said he would do his very best to forward their views.

On the 10th July last, at Plunketstown, county Kildare, Catherine Ryan, aged about 12 years, received a gun-shot wound from Master Robert Drought, who is about her own age. On the 20th of the same month he was put on trial at Athy before the Lord Chief Baron, charged with unlawfully and maliciously wounding. The jury acquitted him, believing the discharge of the gun to be purely accidental ; at the same time the learned judge said the boy's father was guilty of the grossest misconduct in allowing him to have the use of fire arms. The little girl has since died.

A Ballymena correspondent of the Banner of Ulster writes that he has pulled two clusters of common hazel nuts from one bush in a small wood in the neighborhood of Ballymena. One had thirteen and the other twelve nuts, in perfect health, and nearly full grown. Hallow Eve may want apples, but, the editor of the Banner says, there will be plenty of filberts and nuts to decide the fate of all lovers who believe in the charm of nut burning.

The ribbon of St. Patrick is, it is said, to be bestowed upon the Earl of Shrewsbury, Waterford, and Wexford, whose personal and ancestral claims to an Irish honor, the Dublin Evening Mail observes, are to be found in the fact, that he is connected with Ireland neither by property nor interest ; and that his titular relation with two Irish localities is a remnant of the handiwork of Black Tom Strafford, who received the Earldoms of Waterford and Wexford in the course of his thorough management of the Stuart despotism.

The bridge built over the Boyne, at Oldbridge, has been opened for traffic. The contractor, Thomas Hammond, Esq., entertained a large party to celebrate the occasion. The band of the Louth Rifles was in attendance, and the proceedings of the day passed off with the greatest eclat. The counties of Meath and Louth pay £500 each for the erection of the bridge. It will prove a great convenience in that part of the country.

We are not, says the Galway Vindicator, so well-defended in this city of Galway which just lies opposite New York, and is so tempting to the Filibusters of that warlike region. We have not only not a soldier, but even a single militia staffman amongst us. Yet, strange to say, we eat, drink, and are merry ; get up, and lie down, without any fears on account of our unprotectedness.

Captain Frizell has surrendered the Carlow and Baltinglass Barracks to Captain Green, the Barrackmaster of Kilkenny, and the Athy Barracks, to Capt. Vivian, of Newbridge. Captain Frizell, who will, in future, have the charge of the barracks of Belfast, Carrickfergus, and Downpatrick, has left Carlow bearing with him the respect and esteem of his fellow-townsmen.

The last of the English in the Crimea is said to have been one Patrick Carey. He was a member of the Land Transport Corps, and was found lying in one of the trenches very drunk. Half a dozen Cossacks laid him upon a stretcher ; and he had the honor of leaving the seat of war like Desmond of old, upon the necks of the foe.

A large blue-book of nearly 400 pages contains the Report of a Select Committee of the House of Commons on the Irish Court of Chancery and other collateral bills. The Committee report their opinion that it is essential that the constitution of the Court of Chancery in Ireland should be altered, and its procedure and practice reformed ; that a court of appeal in Chancery should be constituted, to consist of the Lord Chancellor, and an additional judge to be Lord Justice of the Court of Appeal, with power to the court to call in the aid of a judge of one of the courts of common law ; that all repeals from orders or decrees of the Master of the Rolls and all rehearings of decisions of the Lord Chancellor should be determined by the Court of Appeal ; that the Lord Chancellor, Master of the Rolls, and Judge of the Court of Appeal should be armed with extensive powers to reform and regulate the practice and procedure of the court, so as to attain economy, simplicity, and expedition, and should be bound to make general orders accordingly ; and that the appointment of receivers should be discouraged. The Committee further reccommend that the Incumbered Estates Court be continued for one year, and that appeals from that court should lie to the Court of Appeal in Chancery, instead of to the Privy Council. They are also of opinion that the system of conferring an indefeasible title on judicial sales of incumbered estates in Ireland should be perpetuated, that the benefits flowing from that system should be extended to unencumbered estates, and that a tribunal ought to exist in Ireland, having power to confer an indefeasible title on the sale of estates, the titles to which, being submitted to a judicial investigation, should be found satisfactory.

The ships of war, Wellington, Conqueror, the gun-boat, and the Admiralty yacht, Osborne, returned to Queenstown yesterday after having cruised westward to Bantry Bay. Their lordships left their yacht to visit Killarney. Various rumours are afloat as to Government measures with regard to Queenstown ; one that it is to be made a permanent naval station ; another that a gridiron for the repair of her Majesty's vessels is to be placed at Haulbowline, that island is to be devoted exclusively to naval purposes, and that the Ordnance department is to be removed to the military barracks at Queenstown.

An inquest has been held at Killany, near Saintfield, before John A. Ward, Esq., coroner for the county Down, on the body of the woman named McDowell, whom her husband David McDowell, killed by a blow on the previous day. An extraordinary case was lately heard before the Mayor of Limerick, in his Court of Conscience. It appeared, in the course of the hearing, that two little boys of this city, one aged 11 and the other 14 years, took a notion of setting out in the world for themselves. They accordingly raised a sum of money in town, and in order to escape detection in the course of their travels, they walked to Roscrea, from whence they took the train to Dublin. From Dublin they proceeded by the steamer to Liverpool, where the younger boy finding himself so far from home, got alarmed, and resolved upon returning at once. He did so. On his voyage to Dublin in the steamboat, he was robbed of all the money he had. He landed in Dublin once more, and set out on the road, as he thought, for Limerick; but he was astonished to find himself, one fine evening in Navan, in the County Meath. However, the young chap's perseverance did not flag, and ultimately he made his way to Limerick, without a shilling in his pockets.

Queen Victoria has signified her intention of conferring a British peerage on Lord Talbot de Malahide. The title of Tyrconnell has been selected by his lordship as that by which he will hold his seat in the House of Peers. An English coronet was bestowed by Lord Melborne's government, upon the uncle of the present peer, who was created Lord Furnival in 1839, but the latter title became extinct, on his decease without male issue, in 1849. The name of Lord Talbot de Malahide is well known in the literary world, as the President of the Archæological Society of Great Britain and Ireland. He has chosen the title of Tyrconnell in virtue of his relation as their general to Richard Talbot, created earl by James II., and afterwards Duke of Tyrconnel, who died in the service of that monarch while holding the post of chief governor of Ireland, and whose only sister married Richard Talbot, auditor-general of Ireland before the revolution, from whom the present peer is fourth in direct descent. Since the revolution of 1688, the earldom of Tyrconnell was conferred on the Carpenter family in 1761, but became extinct in the person of the fourth earl, in January 1853.

A blind man named Collins, on his way from a place called Lady's Well, County Cork, where he had gone for the benefit of his sight, was robbed, as he supposed, by a young boy with him, who acted as his guide, of the sum of 10 sovereigns. The robbery took place in Bantry, and, on information being given to Head-Constable Humphries of the occurrence, he proceeded to the house of a man named Mahony, accompanied by Sub-Constable M'Mahon, where they succeeded in getting six sovereigns and a half and some silver. The sovereigns were got in a purse in the bed in which Mahony's wife lay, she being at the time in bed. The person who is supposed to have originally committed the crime was also in the house, and the whole of the parties were arrested and committed for trial, and the money thus secured for the blind man by the vigilance of the Head-Constable and the men under his charge.

An inquest has been held by Mr. Richard Jones, coroner, at the North Infirmary, Cork, on the body of Johanna Reardon, who was accidentally killed near St. Luke's Church. It appeared that a cab-driver named John Morrison was driving a lady and gentleman, from the Wellington in the direction of St. Luke's, when the horse which was kicking all the way, suddenly started off, and overthrowing the car, pitched passengers and driver on the road. Before the parties could rise, the horse continued to dash forward, and coming in contact with the woman Reardon, who was crossing the road, knocked her down, and killed her almost instantaneously. No blame could be attached to the driver, who in the beginning did all in his power to check the animal.

Dr. Purcell has been engaged in Tralee, investigating a charge of neglect of duty, preferred by the High Sheriff, Richard Chute, Esq., against his cousin, Richard Chute, Esq., M. D., and Stephen O'Ryan, Esq., M. D., the two dispensary doctors of the district, for neglecting to visit a poor man who was dangerously ill, notwithstanding, it is alleged, that two regular tickets were given for the purpose. The poor man died without medical assistance being afforded him, and Mr. Chute insisted on a searching inquiry. The case is charged as one of wilful neglect.

O'Hara was also struck, deprived of his speech and the use of his entire side, but is still alive.

Alexander Joseph Hackett, one of the most useful and respectable citizens of Kilkenny, has just passed into the tomb. He sleeps not far off from John Banim, whom he knew and loved so well. The services he rendered, at the expense of health, comfort, and fortune, will long keep his memory green.

The Sisters of Mercy, Dublin, acknowledge having received from the Rev. Dr. Spratt the sum of £288, being the proceeds of £300 Three per cent Government Stock, bequeathed to the trustees of the Mater Misericordiæ Hospital by the will of the late Very Rev. Matthew Flanagan, P. P., of St. Nicholas Without.

Three Saturdays ago there was not a loaf of bread to be purchased in Rathkeale; it was all bought up by the farmers during the day for reapers. Silver is also very scarce in that town in consequence of farmers taking all they could find to pay the harvest men.

Mr. Dargan shortly proceeds to the Continent. It is said he will visit Turkey, in connection with railroads.

LETTER FROM JOHN O'MAHONY.

113, Prince street, Brooklyn,
September 15th, 1856.

My dear Meagher—In my last letter I made an unintentional omission, by not being more explicit in stating my exact meaning, when I said that "I was unaided by any except by simple though brave and devoted peasants and mechanics" in my attempt in '48. Although this may have been sufficiently explained by my having said, immediately after, that I was then "utterly unsupported by any of the master minds of our party," still some may deem that I meant to make light of the hearty and resolute help I then received from three young friends of mine, two of them from Dublin, who cannot be styled either peasants or mechanics. These friends of mine will themselves understand that this seeming forgetfulness of them on my part resulted merely from the fact, that I have not yet learned to draw a line of distinction between their exertions and my own, so closely were they interwoven during the short time we were fellow-laborers in the cause of Irish revolution. But others may not understand me as well as they must. It is for the latter reason I again claim a place in your columns.

Foremost among these, my fellow-workers, was our friend, John Savage. Him I met for the first time as he was looking for you, a few days after that night of gloom when you and I last parted with despairing hearts upon the side of Slieve-na-mon. From that time, until all our hopes were shattered, John Savage never flinched from the post of danger, nor was any duty dependent upon him left undone. If the truth, fixedness of purpose, untiring work, and buoyant enthusiasm of any one man could have made up for the disadvantages resulting from youthful inexperience, want of previous political fame, and from not being personally known in the locality where he labored, could then have retrieved our cause, John Savage would have done it. He participated in all my plans, and attended all my midnight councils. He shared with me the bivouac upon the bleak hills, and partook of my hard bed in our rock-bound grot of Ballyquireen, or, as we lay side by side in some fragrant meadow by its banks, we listened together to the Suir's wild lullaby singing us to sleep. No; I did not and could not mean to make light of the co-operation of John Savage. But unluckily neither bravery, talent nor devotion could alone have retrieved our cause then. The undisciplined people wanted to see men at their head that they knew, and to whose influence they had been accustomed to yield obedience in political matters. These should have been either the heads of our party, to whom we rustic rebels had been accustomed to look up as our prophets and guides through the public press, or those local leaders, whom the suffrages of their fellows had made presidents of district clubs. The latter class, mostly composed of recent deserters from the camp of the peaceful agitators, cowered beneath the mere suspension of the Habeas Corpus. They had then had quite enough of rebellion. The misfortune of Ballingarry disheartened the real and earnest leaders of our party, who unluckily did not know the people. Their position, or their literary avocations, placed them too far away from the true fighting men, and they fancied, when they found themselves deserted by those parish agitators, that crowded round them on the sunny day, and that fled when the storm had come, that they had been deserted by those whose liberty had been the object of their life's labor, and for whom they had devoted themselves most unreservedly. But I am getting into a subject that might lead me too far, and am forgetting my second friend.

He was a brave and enthusiastic young clerical student named John Grant. This generous youth ran away from college to fly to his country's rescue in '48, and thereby ruined his professional prospects in life. He, too, never flinched or relinquished the cause, while any hope remained. He was of giant frame, hasty to strike, but quick to forgive—our "Dickon draw the sword,"—or rather, we might call him the Friar Tuck of our woodland campaign. I learn that he is now an American soldier in some frontier station—engaged, perhaps, in sweeping the "Terrible Prairie Men" from the paths of Anglo-Saxon pedlars. Heaven send him, and all other wild Irishmen who love the sword, better employment for their martial temper than can be had in robbing the Red Man of his own, or, if appearances be true, than is likely to be gained in clearing a road for Yankee greed, Yankee hypocrisy, cant, Bibles, and other Yankee notions amongst our kinsmen in creed, if not in the flesh, the Spaniards of South America. I know you and the vast majority of my trans-Atlantic countrymen differ from me on this subject, and call North American aggression upon the Southern Republics, the diffusion of Republican order—you will I trust bear with my difference of sentiment which I bring in thus incidentally here. It is a question too far off for us to quarrel thereon. I, however, understand it differently, and consider it the diffusion of a hybrid Anglo-Saxon order—in other terms, the diffusion of the Autocracy of Mammon, that "least erected spirit that fell from Heaven." Will the Irish ever remember that there is no one country under the sun, where the name of Irishman is not considered a reproach, but in the countries where those same maligned Spaniards, the children of our ancient allies, dwell? Will they, also, ever think that there is no country—not even England herself—where it is considered so great a disgrace to be Irish, in the eyes of the unthinking vulgar, as in this free, so-called, Anglo-Saxon Republic, where we now are, and for which they are so very ready to pour out their blood upon all occasions. For this Republic have they thanklessly helped to rob the Mexicans of California; and for it they are now just as ready to aid in adding Cuba or Nicaragua to the already too wide domains of Anglo-Saxondom.

But this has nothing to do with my third helper, Philip Grey, of Dublin, (no relative of the gentleman of the Freeman's Journal). This Philip Grey I found to have been the most untiring and most indomitable of all the men that then took the field for Fotherland. He could never be made to understand that we were beaten. It was he that worked hardest of us all to retrieve our lost cause. He is also the man of whom least has been said, and whose name has been scarcely heard by one out of ten, even in our Democratic ranks. Of him, I must say, that Ireland needs but a few such steady, silent and persevering laborers as he, with some cool-headed planners to point their work for them, in order to be again ready for revolution, whenever internal agitation, England's difficulties or external events afford her an opportunity therefor. I have said be ready for revolution, because, after considering the subject a good deal, and having had some experience at home and in France, I have come to the conviction that no society of men who are not armed, disciplined and regularly officered can make a revolution at any stated time, fixed upon by themselves beforehand. The very agitation of men's minds, from nervous expectancy, would, in itself, defeat any such pre-arrangement. When the hour had come men's spirits would be found already exhausted—they would themselves be found unready, and could only show their sincerity by regretting the hour when it had passed. We all saw this in Ireland in '48. I saw the same thing happen again in Paris in June, '49, then, when Ledru Rollin had to flee to England. Every true Democrat expected a fight at that time, and thousands were girding themselves, for days before, for the struggle. Martin McDermott, John O'Donnell, James Stephens, John Burke, and I, hoped on that day to have fraternized with our brother Democrats on the Parisian barricades, and by mingling our blood with theirs for universal liberty, we trusted to have shown them that some Irishmen, at least, could and would fight for freedom anywhere. But the day came—there were a few riots, but no fight. In that city, where every tenth, perhaps every fifth fighting Democrat is a disciplined soldier, no decent stand could be made. The affair was not even as serious as our skirmish at Ballingarry. It is only when men in official authority conspire, that a revolution can be carried by a pre-determined coup de main.

I have thought it right to state this opinion of mine here, apropos of the indomitable Carbonaro, Philip Grey, because some give me the credit of thinking, that a revolution can be effected in Ireland by popular conspirators at some pre-determined time, or upon some pre-arranged signal. I do not now believe any such thing. But what I think is, that unless our countrymen at home do organize always and run the risk of being now and then condemned by our tyrants as traitors and conspirators therefor, that opportunity will come to them either from without, as it did in '48, or from some political ferment within, as it has often done, and that they will be found by it undecided and unready; and thus let the chance glide by in omne volubilis ævum. It would be otherwise if Ireland had within her an organized society of watchful, patient and resolute men—no builders of airy castles, or formers of over sanguine hopes, but men who would watch and wait, ever ready to throw themselves into any national ferment, no matter by what pacific agitator it was caused, nor what its object, and to raise the flag of Freedom therein. Then the pacific agitators who had looked but for some pitiful reform, or who but sought to gratify some miserable ambition, would shrink back aghast and leave the field to bolder and truer men—amazed at finding themselves and their petty schemes swept along in the full flood of freedom. Such is my idea of what an Irish organization should be—a sheathed weapon, always ready to the hand when the occasion came for using it. It was such an organization that engulphed that pacific agitator, Odillon Barrot, in February, '48. Who more astonished than he when the oft-defeated Clubs and Sections came down into the streets, joined his ranks, and changed the cry of "Vive la Reform," to "Vive la Republique!" He and his party wanted merely to get the handling of the helm of State into their own hands. For this had they stirred up the national mind. But those patient watchers of the Faubourgs who had waited for their opportunity through years of obloquy, defeat and proscription, stepped forth into the popular ranks and practically proclaimed that if the people were to contend at all it should be for something worth fighting for. So it might have been with us, were conspiracy popular in Ireland, or were our young men of mind philosophic enough to throw off the trammels of fashionable cant.

There is another matter to which I will allude before I conclude this very rambling epistle. It is to that cry that some of our disappointed men of '48 have raised against the present apathy of the Irish political mind, and the opinion they thence form as to the utter hopelessness of attempting to rouse that land from its lethargy. Its apathy is, in my opinion, not at all to be wondered at. It is perfectly natural, and I rather think that it is even for the best to have it so, for if an organization were to be again set on foot that very apathy would, in my opinion, favor its originators. It would add to its stability also by preventing the giddy and impatient majority from rushing suddenly into its ranks through overwrought excitement. It is a popular fallacy to think that the previous consent of the majority is necessary for successful revolution. Revolutions are nearly always made by a few hardy and devoted spirits, who seize upon the proper time therefor, and that time is whenever any national or political crisis shows that it is practicable and needful. The majority does but accept revolution when wanted. The authors of Irish jeremiads do not seem to bear this fact sufficiently in mind.

I remain, very sincerely yours,

John O'Mahony,

IRISH MONASTERIES.

The Dominican Friary of Limerick was founded by O'Brien, King of Thomond, in 1227, under the invocation of St. Saviour. He himself was buried here, and a magnificent statue was placed over his tomb, which continued uninjured until the Williamite forces obtained possession of the city, and then it was wantonly destroyed by them. Here also were interred Simon O'Currin, Christian and Maurice O'Brien, Bishops of Kilfenoragh; Matthew O'Hagan, Bishop of Killaloe; and Hubert de Burgh, Bishop of Limerick. Previous to the so-called Reformation a monument existed to their memory, on which was engraved the following inscription:—

"Senos Pontifices in se locus claudit iste,
Illis multiplices te posco præmia Christe.
Omnes hi fuerant fratrem laris hujus amici;
Hubertus de Burgh, Præsul quondam Limerici;
Donald, Mattheus, Pastores Laonienses,
Christian, Mauritius, Simon quoque Fenaborensis,
Ergo Benigne Pater, locus hos non comprimat ater,
Qui legis ista, Pater dicas, et Ave reboa ter.
Centum namque diesquis rogitando meretur
Datur ut his requies si pura mente procetur.
Quid sis, et quid eris, animo vigili mediteris,
Si minor his fueris, feu major ejusve sodalis
Tandem pulveris eris, non fallit regulatalis."

Harris, from whom I have copied the above, then gives his own quaint translation, which, though not written in a very poetic style, I quote for the satisfaction of the reader:—

"Six Prelates here do lie, and in their favor
I beg your friendly prayers to Christ the Saviour;
Who in their lifetime for this house did work;
The first of whom I name was Hubert Burke,
Who graced the sea of Limerick, and Matthew,
With Donald, Bishops both of Killaloe;
Christian and Maurice I should name before,
And Simon, Bishops late of Fenabore.
Therefore, kind Father, let not any soul
Of these good men be lodged in the Black Hole.
You who read this, kneel down in humble posture,
Bellow three Aves and one Pater Noster.
Whoever for their souls sincerely prays,
Merits indulgence of one hundred days,
And you who read the verses on this stone,
Bethink yourself and make the case your own.
Then seriously reflect on what you see,
And think of what you are now, and what you'll be;
Whether you're greater, equal, less, you must
As well as these be crumbled into dust."

James, son of John, Earl of Desmond, was interred here also; and in an ancient calendar of the Friars it is recorded that they were bound to say a yearly anniversary for the soul of the Most Noble Lord James, son of the aforesaid John, he being the second founder of this Friary, and also for the souls of his parents and his successors, with their wives. Vincentio de Bandello, of Castro Nuova, reformed this house in 1504, and it was erected into an University, along with four other Monasteries. And now came the closing scene; and at the general dissolution it was granted to James, Earl of Desmond, in the 35th year of Henry VIII. The Monks, however, did not desert their beloved Monastery, and the order seems to have been in especial favor with the citizens of Limerick. They still lived in the city, and when the Confederated troops obtained possession of the town they again occupied their house. Dark and evil days were in store for them, however, but days when their virtues were to shine more brightly, and they were to give proof to the world that the followers of St. Dominic had not degenerated from the virtue of their founder. The ruthless Cromwell landed on the Irish shores, and let loose his band of fanatic murderers on the country. Strange portents, say the annalists of the time, announced his coming; and when he came before Limerick the Mother of God was seen, attended by St. Francis, St. Dominick, and a throng of bright spirits on the summit of the Church dedicated to her, and, passing slowly through the air, she was seen to enter the Dominican Convent, thence to the Chapel of St. Francis, and then disappear, as they, too, were to disappear, but not for ever. The Convents may rise again on every hill and plain when the divided nations of the Celt shall be joined under the rule of one man, and the Harp be emblazoned on the Tricolor beneath the Eagle's sheltering wing, its cords never to be broken again!

How touching is the brief narrative which O'Daly gives of Wolf, the Friar, who, absent when Ireton captured the city, returned for the purpose of attending the dying soldiers: seized in the midst of his work of mercy, he was hurried to a gibbet, and there hanged;—of Collins, who bearing aloft a crucifix, headed the Irish troops at the capture of Bunratty, and, made captive by Ireton, sealed his faith with his blood. "Glorious was his end, for he knew that it was a beauteous thing to die for his God and his country." And with him ends the history of the Dominican Convent of Limerick.

There were two other houses of less note—the Augustinian Friary, situated in Quay Lane, whose Prior had the first voice in the election of Mayor—and a Preceptory for Knights Templars near this.

It was a dark, stormy night; the rain fell in torrents; not a star was visible; the whole sky seemed like one vast arch of iron, and the wind swept in fitful gusts over the plains from the distant summits of the Slieve Phelim mountains. But, though the hour was late and the tempest wild, there was a vast concourse of people abroad, near the little village of Abington. Torches flashed amid the gloom, and floating sadly on the breeze was heard a low melancholy wail, now sinking gradually, and anon swelling into strange and piercing cadences. The regular tramp of men, moving in array, struck on the ear, and, as the procession approached the little hamlet, the unsteady and flickering light of the flambeaux disclosed a large body of cavalry moving slowly forward. Their burnished helmets gleamed brightly, and as the wind blew aside their long, heavy horsemen's cloaks, their polished coats of mail were revealed. Their lances were lowered, no banners waved above them, and at intervals their trumpets blew a few wailing notes. After them came a body of foot; their arms reversed, and their surcoats stained with wet and mire, as if after a long and wearisome march. In their centre was a car of strange form, drawn by eight coal-black steeds, and surrounded by a throng of gentlemen, clad in long sable mantles. When they reached the Abbey gate they paused; the horsemen sprung from their saddles; the infantry deployed into line, and the trumpets blew a wild eastern march as a rich coffin was lifted from the car and borne into the church. Strange contrast to the scene without: it was brilliantly lighted, and through the lofty aisles the solemn notes of the Dies Iræ resounded. On his throne sat the Abbot, clad in gorgeous vestments, and in lengthened row below him were his Monks; their pale, emaciated faces and shaven crowns contrasting strongly with the bronzed and bearded warriors around, and before the altar was placed the coffin. It was a solemn sight—one suggestive of the nothingness of life, and the worthlessness of all earthly grandeur. There were the holy religious—there the stern soldiers, and there in his narrow bed, cold and silent in death, was the founder of the Abbey himself—the head of a proud house—Theobald Fitzwalter, Lord Carrick, and Lord Chief Butler of Ireland. He heeded not the tempest without, nor the splendor within. His ear heard not the prayers which were poured forth for his soul, nor felt he the deep sorrow of those stern knights who had been the sharers of his perils and the partakers of his fortune. His earthly cares were over, and the founder of the Ormond family lies now in a deserted and mouldering tomb. He had erected this Abbey of Abington in accordance with the usual plan of those worthy missionaries whom Nicholas Breakspeare sent to civilize us, and who quieted their consciences, after a life of sacrilege and robbery, by founding and richly endowing some magnificent Abbey. They imagined, too, that by introducing foreign Monks, and carefully excluding all of Irish name and birth, that, finally, they would acquire control over the Church, and convert it into an useful instrument of state. In the main their designs were frustrated, for the simple Monks could not be convinced that Irish Kernes were destined for no other end than to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. Although the community of Abington was composed of French Cirtercians, brought from the Abbey of Savignac, yet, in a short time, they seem to have become more Irish than the Irish themselves, for we find that, in 1290, Hugh, the Abbot, was condemned to pay sixty marks for harboring the King's enemies. This same Hugh, in 1292, mortgaged the Church of Thurles and its tithes for fifteen years to Reginald Rapundi and Francis Malesar, merchants of Lucca, and he bound himself, if he did not perform the terms of the contract, to forfeit the sum of one thousand pounds. The lands were subsequently restored to the Abbey by the merchants, on condition of receiving out of them the yearly rent of eight marks. Here, on the 27th May, 1299, Theobald Butler was buried with great pomp beside the first and greatest of his race. Some years afterwards the Abbey became subject to that of Kells, and paid to it one hundred shillings annually, but the reason, whereof, am ignorant.

Founded by the Butlers, its Abbots li d not lay aside the feelings of clansmen when they assumed the cowl, and warmly participated in the jealousy which existed against the Geraldines who had founded an Abbey, destined to rival their own in magnificence, by the banks of the beautiful Maigue. Henry, who was Abbot in 1265, was a bold and talented man, who concealed beneath the monk's hood the genius of a statesman, and was more fitted to wield the mace and battle-axe than cross or crozier. One time he learned that Thomas of Kildare with a small retinue was to pass near the abbey. He collected his retainers and placed them in ambush by the road along which Fitzgerald journeyed. During the course of a long summer's day they lay concealed among the heather, and as the sun was sinking the scouts gave warning that the Earl was at hand. On came his little retinue beguiling the way with laughter and song, and unsuspicious of any danger. They were almost in the snare when the quick eye of Thomas discerned the gleam of a lance-head among the bushes. He hastily drew his men together, and ere the opposing party could form, charged down on them, and after a fierce but brief conflict dispersed them, smiting down and taking prisoner with his own hand, Henry, who, attired in helm and mail, had taken an active part in the fray. He bore him to Dublin, where he was imprisoned, but after a short confinement, was pardoned by the King on payment of the then large sum of forty shillings.

From this, the calm life of the monks was disturbed by no untoward event until the desolating wars of Elizabeth's reign. Then was religion virtually banished from the land; every man was a soldier, every house a fortress, every abbey a citadel. The whole of Munster was converted into a vast camp, the earth lay uncultivated, and every day brought mingled tidings of victory and defeat. At this mournful period was John Mulryan Abbot, the last Abbot who was ever to rule at Abington. He saw the ruin that was impending, and sadly and patiently resigned himself to the inevitable decree of fate. His Monastery was occupied by English soldiers, and hither came the Deputy Grey, where he received the submission of Mick Burke of Clanricarde, and Thybot Burke McWilliam, traitors who distinguished themselves by an unvarying and savage hostility towards their poor persecuted countrymen. At length the war ceased—an unnatural calm lay on the land, and bleeding and helpless she lay bound at the feet of her conquerors, for them to work their will on her as they would. The mandate was issued for the destruction of the religious houses, and John O'Mulryan and his monks left the home where they had dwelt in happiness so long—the home of virtue and religion—and fled for safety in their old age to a foreign land. Their broad estates which had supported the poor and the needy, were now seized by the crown, and granted to Peter Walshe, at the yearly rent of £57 2s. 3., and on condition of maintaining one horseman properly mounted and armed.

THE CLERK OF THE HANAPER.

From the Dublin Nation.

Captain John O'Connell has got his reward, and a very wretched reward it is. Ten years have just been completed since his miserable vanity and virulent temper compelled the fatal schism between Old and Young Ireland. We live in days whose distance is marked by a striking contrast, that will stand like a pillar of fire in history. It is the great moral lesson taught to the People of Ireland in the silent dignity with which Smith O'Brien returned to his home, a few days before John O'Connell, with greedy alacrity, shuffles into a paltry place. Ten years ago, the island was disturbed from shore to shore by the storm which O'Connell's favorite son had used all O'Connell's accumulated power to arouse against that glorious generation of young men who had sprung to manhood and to genius under the influence of the old Tribune himself in '43, and of Thomas Davis afterwards. Week after week, the failing intellect of the old man was stimulated to a war of extermination against those whom Nature destined to be the inheritors of his policy and the guardians of his fame. It was a pitiable and unnatural war, and John O'Connell made it inevitable and unscrupulous. In all the annals of mortal vanity and imbecility there is no paragon for his attempt to seize and to wield the extraordinary power of O'Connell, against the other political talents which had been developed in the national agitation.

It seems like an outrage upon common sense to say that such a creature should have obtained and should have held O'Connell's mighty place for a day. But he did for weeks, and months, and years, until he had disgusted and alienated every ally and friend of his father; until he had broken or rotted the whole political system of which he suddenly found himself the centre; until the very coal-porters of Burgh quay jeered at the mannikin Liberator in a moustache and a militia frock; until he had become the tool and the toady of a new generation of political adventurers—the bolder and more gambling Keoghs, Sadleirs and Scullys. Ten years ago he stood in a glorious position, if he had genius, honesty, and courage—in a great one if he had even talent, tact, and a little manly modesty. Tuam and Meath, Wexford and Tipperary, Cork, and Waterford and Limerick still bent before the very name of O'Connell. In the presence of a great providential calamity, the moral force of the old leader was even greater from his grave than it had been during the last irresolute and imbecile months of his action in Irish affairs. Mr. John O'Connell in such an hour, by his father's express desire, assumed the leadership of the Irish people. But "a leader is one who leads," and John O'Connell could lead nowhere. A Tribune is one who can win the minds of men—and John O'Connell could never win the mind of any man or woman in the world. He must have been gifted by nature with singularly small faculties, for he has had every oportunity for experience and example, and he has made the most ridiculous failure of any man who ever attempted a public life. It would be well, if it were merely ridiculous—but it was notoriously mischievous too. God knows it would be a great mischief, if it were only to have sullied the great old man's pall, with all this sordes of corruption, and with the reflection of all the falsehood, and trickery, and vanity, and bigotry, and meanness, which O'Connellism, as impersonated and represented by John O'Connell has come to mean since his death. It is a pity to think of the grand figure which Hogan has made immortal, so full of pride and power and authority, looking every inch what he was, the impersonation of a whole race—and to look at the "stunted corporal" who takes off his coatee as he slips into the Hanaper Office, and sells the rights of his dynasty, like some King of Mosquito or other deposed barbarian, for a few hundreds a-year.

It is probable that there never was a public man, however, who played so long a game with such a barren intellect and such an audacious vanity. Whoever observes his proceedings since they became individual must remark how carefully, and indeed (to do him justice) cunningly, he always took care to avoid placing himself before the people in juxtaposition with any man of very signal abilities. He was quite conscious that he could not have acted for a month before the country with Duffy, or Lucas, or Moore, or even with Keogh or Sadleir without being discovered to be an intellectual imposter.

He had not the brains to make a public man; and he was always spitefully and jealously conscious that he had got into a position for which he was unfit. Yet he never had the manliness or the sense to abdicate it. He had still immense power for thwarting other men, and for making mischief. He could always give a certain sanction in a rascally career. He had for a long time the mere mob of O'Connell's forces ready to do his bidding. To them he was an idol for a long season, but even they tired of him at last. His method was no very wonderful mystery. O'Connell taught the Art of Speech-making made easy. He had a great deal to speak, far more than the great deal he always had to say demanded. The people were used to hear him for three hours at a time, and no orator that ever lived could speak with novelty, with eloquence, and with force for three hours at a time, so often a week, as O'Connell had to deliver himself. Accordingly, he had invented a system of oratory, a miscellaneous gossipy budget of odds and ends, the news of the week, the state of the country, abuse of enemies, praise of friends, old anecdotes, the rise of the rent, a fine easy dash of the elements of braggadocio and blarney. John O'Connell had caught the knack of this slip-shod every-day style, but he made such a sorrowful travesty of it! He had neither the fancy, the fun, nor the fire which made whatever the old man said, however it read, fall happily on the ear. He spun the same subjects, which the old man could always warm and enliven, into a mere bungle of bosh, the "white curd of asses' milk" turned sour and unwholesome by a dash of vile gall.

He had lived to see all his father's friends and allies at last disgusted by his selfishness and outraged by his incapacity. Even his own kith and kin were in the end driven to protest against the way he abused the great name and traditional power of which he had assumed the monopoly. Maurice Leyne, the most gifted scion of the old man's blood, flung himself into the ranks of the Confederates early in '48. Maurice O'Connell, a few days before his death, asking Duffy to spend a few days with him at Darrynane, confessed that John had been the curse of his name and of his country. There is another noble young kinsman of the Liberator—and who wears a name that is as old in Kerry as the Glens and the Lakes—the O'Donoghue, who, mingling seldom and modestly in public life, has never lost an opportunity of testifying that his sympathies are with bolder, more honest, and straightforward courses. And so, as he turns from drilling paupers to signing writs and issuing commissions, the last rag of the old man's mantle falls from the Captain and the Clerk of the Hanaper. We invite the Irish People once more to behold their leader ensconced in a beggarly sinecure at the Four Courts; and then to join our pious prayer that Captain Dan may soon be bought, sold, and packed for exportation—that so a historic name may be no longer blotted by this paltry traffic, which is driven on its former greatness.

IRISH SCHOLARSHIP.

In yesterday's paper we gave the list of successful candidates at the recent examinations held in the King's College, Woolwich. At the January examination the highest number of marks obtained for Provisional Commissions was 4,623, the next highest 4,015. In the Practical Class, the highest number of marks was 4,869, and the next highest 4,131. It will be seen by the list alluded to, and as connected with this June examination, that the highest number of marks obtained by the Provisional Candidates was 5,594, the next highest 4,725. In this class the name of Mr. E. D. Tarleton, of the Dublin University, stands at the head of the list. In the Practical—Royal Academy—Class, the highest number of marks obtained was 5,819, the next highest 4,716. The young gentleman who stands at the head of this list is Mr. Joseph Allan Millar, of Lisburn, Student of Queen's College, Belfast. Mr. Millar, it will be observed, obtained 1,103 marks above the highest of his competitors in the Practical Class, and 225 marks above the highest in the Provisional Class. It must be highly satisfactory to the authorities of the Queen's College to find one of their students standing at the head of the list in an examination open to the competition of the United Kingdom. Now that the barricades which so long stood in the way of unpatronized talent are broken down, the omnious words, "no thoroughfare," will cease to deter young men of ability from preparing themselves for East India or Royal appointments.

We do not believe that we have a right to attribute the triumph which the Irish students have just achieved to the inferior training of the competing cantabs, or to any defect in the education of the Oxonian candidates. We do not feel that we would be warranted in considering that the alumni of that proud Seminary, which history tells us existed in the time of the great Alfred, and whose educational system has had the advantage of centuries of experience, were possessed of fewer opportunities for preparation than the students of Belfast Queen's College, of Dublin University, or of the Catholic University, presided over by the Most Rev. Dr. Cullen. The presumption, in fact, ought to be that they had none; but their defeat shows, either that the system of education in the Irish Institutions is better than in the venerable seats of learning in the sister country, or that our students are more fitted mentally for the acquisition of learning. Either way we have cause for congratulation. Ireland has had the means of educational success placed within her reach, and, as we have seen, her children have not been slow to take advantage of them. The day of full participation in all the honors of the State dawns on the people of this country. Let us hope they will wear their honors when they win them, in future, as nobly as they contended against difficulties hitherto. England and Scotland have had their day of place and their tenure of patronage. Into the openings which have been made in the citadel of State appointments our young men have found means of ingress, and, once there, we can have little fear, from the promise already given, of their maintaining their position against the most accomplished of their rivals.

THE O'CONNELL MONUMENT IN LIMERICK.

The colossal statue in bronze of the Liberator, which is to stand in Limerick as a perpetual monument of that great man, and of the national feeling of the city of the Violated Treaty, is at length finished, so far as the mind work of the artist is concerned. Last week the clay model, upon which the sculptor, Hogan, expended all the resources of his creative art for the last three or four months, was transferred to the more solid material of plaster—a necessary preliminary to the next great and costly process of casting the vast work in bronze—which latter operation will be executed in one of the great foundries of Paris, where a familiarity with the casting of important works of art has enabled the men employed in that particular branch to arrive at, perhaps, the greatest perfection of skill in such a process that can be found in the world. The sculptor has then performed his more immediate portion of the work; we can now speak of it as a finished production of art; and as such, having had the pleasure of inspecting it, we feel sincere delight, for the sake both of the work and of the artist, in being able to describe it as a noble and most successful effort of genius. Grand, massive, and dignified, it represents the illustrious O'Connell in an attitude as characteristic as it is majestic. It is an attitude full of eloquent expression—the right hand raised gracefully before the breast, corresponding in action with the position of the head, and with the play of the lips and the eyes, all of which seem to address the spectators in one of those sweetest effusions of persuasive sentiment in which O'Connell loved so much to indulge. The figure, which stands eight feet and some inches above the plinth, is partly enveloped in a large cloak, which, although the costume is entirely modern, is so skilfully arranged as to invest the whole with a fine classic style, affording, besides, to Hogan all that facility for a rich, natural disposition of drapery in which he is unexcelled by any living artist. The folds are broad and massive—the leading characteristics of the whole work—and at the same time flexible and graceful, preserving all the softness and pliability of nature. But what is still more important the likeness is admirable. In this respect Hogan has been even more fortunate here than in his former figures or heads of O'Connell; and we have little doubt that any one who has ever seen the Liberator during the memorable period of the monster meetings and the State trials will hesitate for a moment in perceiving the features and the expression of the man in this work of the Irish sculptor. We can easily anticipate with what enthusiasm these venerated and beloved features will be hailed by the warm-hearted men of Limerick and Clare, when from the lofty pedestal they will seem once more to smile down upon them; and how proudly they will be regarded, thus preserved in the imperishable bronze and in the heroic proportions of classic art, of which the illustrious original was so worthy! In one word, we believe this to be the most successful of Hogan's monumental statues, or, perhaps, we might say, of all his works, and we have no doubt that he may safely, as he said he would, allow his fame as an Irish sculptor to rest upon its merits.

The figure is now ready for transmission to Paris, and the process of packing it up for that purpose, will, we believe, commence in a few days. Once in Paris, the casting in bronze will occupy but little time, and thus in a very few weeks we may expect to see it back again in Ireland, and ready for erection on the pedestal which has already been prepared to receive it in the Crescent at Limerick. It is most truly a national work, and we sincerely rejoice in its progress and success.

THE IRISH VOTE.

The opposer of the Know Nothing Order finds in the present attitude of the great body of the foreign-born voters in the country the amplest as well as the most gratifying vindication of his course in waging war upon that ruthless and proscriptive organization. The union of the States is assailed with a fury which defies all precedent by the Black Republican party, whose one idea is hostility to the institutions of the South; and in the Northern States where the battle is hottest, foreign-born voters are found on the side of the Constitution. With peculiar force, does this remark apply to the natives of the Emerald Isle. It is a remarkable fact that out of the large number comprising that class of citizens, not one has ever been found in the ranks of the abolitionists. Irishmen seem instinctively to hate the freesoil faction. Among the many able and influential Irish journals in the United States, there is not a single one which has not denounced Fremont and the wicked horde of traitors whom he is leading; there is not a single one who is not found doing battle for James Buchanan as the only sure means of saving the government of their adoption, under whose broad ægis they have taken shelter from the storms of oppression.

How gratifying are these undeniable facts, to those Southern men who aided in nipping in the bud the secret society organized to persecute that very class of citizens? How it must overwhelm with shame and contrition the pseudo American patriots who pretended that one object of their immaculate Order was the salvation of the South? At this very hour, when native traitors in the Northern States, led on by the native Fremont, are waging a war of unparalleled violence against the slave-holding States, they are met on their own fields by naturalized Irishmen, who are holding up the Constitution with State Equality inscribed upon it.

In this connection, we desire to introduce extracts from two leading and influential Irish journals, the Irish American, and the Irish News. The former has a circulation of 30,000 subscribers, and wields an immense influence. The latter is edited by Meagher, the Irish patriot, the gifted Meagher, whose words of fire and glowing sentiments illume the columns of his journal and kindle into raptures the hearts of his thousands of readers.

From the Waterford Chronicle.

THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER

Has at last boldly, distinctly, and unequivocally identified himself with the great old Democratic Party of the States—that sub-division of the American element that had the strongest hand in building up the Republic—the warriors and sages at the great Heptarchy of the West. Indeed, Meagher would, in a manner, be ungrateful if he stood aloof from the Democratic ranks, particularly when his adhesion to them, in a time of party struggle and trial in the States for superior skill and ascendancy is of so much importance—we say ungrateful, because we observe that all along up through American history, the largest, oldest party—even individually and collectively—lent to Ireland an encouraging voice, and to Irishmen an aiding hand. It was the existence of the Democratic Party in the States—and it alone—that during the reign of terror, which "Know-Nothingism" for a time produced, rendered Irish life in the States safe or endurable. The Irish Priests are, therefore, we may say, all Democrats. Almost the entire of the Irish people are so. The fact is, the Democrats want the Irish vote for Buchanan's election; and they well know many an Irish vote will follow Meagher where he leads. True it is that slavery is infamous—an infamy of the darkest dye. But the American Democracy found slavery there, not slavery the Democracy.

The Democratic Party will not lay violent hands on the Slave Institutions of the States—we can scarce see how they could in the present state of the American mind, and its educational training, political and scholastic. A re-distribution of the Ulster plantation lands would be more feasible in Ireland, and be attended with fewer difficulties and dangers than would a practical effort, on the part of any American Government, to deny the title of the Southern and Middle State Slaveholders to the human cattle.

California News.

To the Editor of the Irish News:

SAN FRANCISCO, AUGUST 20, 1856.

SIR—Since I wrote to you on the 5th there is not much to note with regard to the Vigilance Committee. There has been no more hanging—no more murders committed by them; and out of a salutary fear of orders from Washington, they have to some extent broken up their organization. In fact their funds had given out, and the foreign hirelings in their employment were thirsting for more pay, or else the execution of the executive members of the Vigilance Committee. Never did I witness such a demand for scalps as was made on the day after the release of Judge Terry. Nothing would satisfy the French hirelings and the German Jews but the hanging of the Executive Committee. I certainly did not envy them their position. It is an easy matter for disorganizers to let loose a mob, but a very difficult thing to control them. There is not the slightest doubt now on any reflecting man's mind, that those disorganizers aimed at the diseverment of this State from the Union, and aimed at what they called a "revolution," which meant the settlement of their eastern accounts with a nil prosequi. The eastern merchants no doubt are finding this out before now, and will find it out heavily before the winter closes. Judge Terry has behaved with great firmness and dignity since his illegal arrest, and utterly refused all terms with the conspirators. They wanted him to vacate his high office from the Supreme Bench, but all their threats of hanging, banishment, &c., &c., could not shake his stern soul. He has triumphed over them, and is now the most popular man in this State. The annexed will give your readers an idea of the occurrences with regard to him:

CHARGES AND SENTENCE AGAINST JUDGE TERRY.

The following are the charges made against Judge David S. Terry before the Executive Committee of the Committee of Vigilance, together with the verdicts of the former body, and of the Delegates from the different companies of the general body:

CHARGES.

1st. David S. Terry is charged with resisting by violence the officers of the Committee of Vigilance while in the discharge of their duty.

Verdict—Guilty.

2nd. David S. Terry is also charged with committing an assault with a deadly weapon, with intent to kill Sterling A. Hopkins, a police officer of the Committee of Vigilance, on the 21st June, 1856.

Verdict—By the Executive Committee of the "assault," by the Delegates, found guilty of the full charge.

3d. David S. Terry is charged with an attack on J. H. Purdy, in the city of San Francisco.

Verdict—By Executive, found guilty; by the delegates, charge expunged.

The following sentence has been pronounced in this case:

SENTENCE.

That David S. Terry, having been convicted after a full, fair and impartial trial, of certain charges, before the Committee of Vigilance, and the usual punishments in their power to inflict, not being applicable in the present instance:

Therefore, be it declared, that the decision of the Committee of Vigilance is as follows: That the said David S. Terry be discharged from custody, and

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Committee of Vigilance, the interests of the state imperatively demand that the said David S. Terry should resign his position as Judge of the Supreme Court.

Resolved, That this resolution be read to David S. Terry, and he forthwith be discharged from the custody of the Committee of Vigilance.

The above sentence was read to Judge Terry, in presence of the Executive Committee, at fifteen minutes past two o'clock yesterday morning, and he was forthwith released from custody.

The following extracts from the French papers, published in this city, will give you the animous of this portion of our population, and the position this city would be placed in, in case of rupture between the United States and France and England. What true American republicans could evoke such an armed power in the heart of one of the states most distant from the seat of government? These extracts leave little doubt of their intentions.

Le Phare, speaking of the release of Judge Terry, says:—"David S. Terry was convicted of two crimes—resistance to the orders of the Vigilance Committee, and an assault upon Sterling Hopkins—and the conclusion that is arrived at from this conviction is, that he should be set at liberty. But, say the members of the Executive Committee, we have not the power to punish. Of what power do you speak? Of legal power? You never had it. Of revolutionary power? That you had. If you sent away Cooney for his women-whipping, and Mulligan for his personal violences and ballot-box stuffing, why did you not expatriate the murderous Judge? [Beautiful language, truly, to be used by foreigners towards an American Judge.] But his friends would have rescued him—it would be impossible to put him on board any vessel without his friends knowing it. And even if he were rescued by his friends, he would be disgraced by the sentence passed upon him, while you would have nothing to do but declare his culpability without reference to the punishment. It was a denial of justice to the people—for never was a judge, no matter who he may be, allowed a jury to declare guilt, without affixing to it some punishment."

L'Echo du Pacifique contains an article in which the editor professes to be unable to understand the verdict, and expresses an anxiety for the Committee to explain their course, under the head of "state of affairs." The editor says: "The serious aspect of affairs imposes upon those of our compatriots who form a portion of the Committee of Vigilance a great circumspection. They will do well not to come to any determination without mature reflection. There is no danger in delay. There might be in acting with precipitation, till matters are fully developed. In the ranks of the Germans, in those of the Americans, as well as ours, the events of yesterday have carried distrust, and discontent. Reason, as well as our position as foreigners, admonish us to know at least what the others will do before we take any steps. Let us then remain calm, cool, but united as a single man (!) as we said not long ago, in anticipation of what has just transpired. Let us be on the qui vive, ready to protect and defend ourselves in the event of any treason being the reward of our devotion to the public good.

To show you how unfortunate the authorities at Washington have been, in their selection of men to fill the Federal offices here, I also annex you a scrap from a morning paper, showing you to what lengths wire-working politicians here will go, to secure their own or their friends' advancement. These are not the only charges against our postmaster, Mr. Weller:

"A telegraphich despatch received in this city yesterday relates the fact that several letters addressed to Judge Terry had been, before he received them, opened in the Post Office. A few days ago a letter addressed by Gen. Howard to Mr. B. W. Leigh, of this city, was intercepted, opened, copied, and published in the papers. Our agent in Shasta, writing to us under date of August 10th, says:

"'The Herald fails to reach me two or three times each week. They are not sent regularly from your office, or there is a systematic plan in the Post Office to destroy them, for all the other San Francisco papers reach me very regularly. If the Herald can be depended upon to arrive, I can get a much larger circulation for it here.'

"Before the organization of the Vigilance Committee no such thing occurred. Their papers are regularly sent from this [Herald] office. The facts which we have given above are quite sufficient to destroy the confidence of the public in the Post Office."

The welcome home to Sacramento of our fearless, upright, and uncompromising Judge Terry, presented a scene of the most genuine, spontaneous, hearty enthusiasm ever witnessed. It will afford intense gratification to the friends of the Constitution, to see him resume his seat on the Supreme Bench, which he so highly adorns, in due course.

Annexed you have also the result of the coroner's inquest on the bodies of Hetherington and Brace, hung by the Vigilance Committee. It is an official document, verbatim et literatim.

The undersigned jurors, convened by Coroner Kent, at his office, No. 161 Sacramento street, in the city of San Francisco, and continued until the 6th day of August, 1856, for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of death of a man named Philander Brace, who was found dead by Coroner Kent, in a room in the third story of a brick building situate on the south side of Sacramento street, between Front and Davis streets, on the evening of the 29th July last. After an examination of the body of deceased, by Dr. Cole, and hearing his medical testimony thereon, accompanied by testimony of other witnesses, all of which we have fully considered, rendered the following verdict:—We find that Philander Brace, a native of Onondaga county, New York, aged 22 years, came to his death on the evening of the 29th July last, by hanging at the hands of one Robert Nixon and a person unknown to the jurors, aided and abetted by a party of men styling themselves the Committee of Vigilance of San Francisco.

A. H. TITCOMB, JAMES V. HARRISON,
JOHN J. HARKNESS, LEVIE ROBIE,
G. O. MCMULLIN, R. S. HAVEN,
HENRY OWNER, Foreman.

Adolph Sutro and W. P. Loring, two of the jurors, refused to sign the above verdict, but there being seven jurors in favor of signing, that was sufficient for to return a verdict.

J. HORACE KENT, Coroner.

The same verdict was returned in the case of Joseph Hetherington, a native of Carlisle, England, aged 36 years.

Both Sutro and Loring refused to sign the verdict of Hetheriugton's case also.

J. H. KENT, Coroner.

I send you by this mail, a steamer edition of a morning paper, from which you will gather the particulars of the breaking up of the Vigilance Committee. One of their chief members, Mr. W. T. Coleman, leaves on the steamer to-day. He is son-in-law to Page, of the banking house of Page, Bacon & Co., who entailed so much misfortune on the working population here, by their ruinous failure. It is to be hoped that he will have pleasant dreams with the blood of so many victims on his hands.

HARD FACTS.

The Boston Times gives the following mysterious story: Some time in the early part of last July, a stray horse was wandering about in the woods and pastures, near the farm of Captain Gilbert Coburn, in Pelham, New-Hampshire. This horse remained in the vicinity for several weeks and then disappeared, being seen last in the highway. Wednesday, Captain Coburn, while traversing a sled road, leading through a piece of swampy ground in a lonely out of the way hollow, came suddenly upon a chaise and harness, that had every appearance of having been standing upon the place where he had found them for at least two months. The shafts were completely enveloped in and overgrown by wild briers and grass. The tiers of the wheels were very rusty, and the whole chaise completely weather-stained. The boot and cushions were very much mildewed. The harness lay partly on the dasher, and partly on the inside of the chaise, and had apparently been taken off in great haste. A pair of lady's gloves rolled up, and a pair of gentleman's gloves, were found on the cushion; also an odd glove. There are appearances of blood on the cushion and carpet. No clue can be found to the solution of this mystery.

Rev. Mr. French, of Washington, is appointed Chaplain to the West Point Military Academy in place of Rev. Mr. Sproule removed.

Answers to Correspondents.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURE.—A correspondent who does us the honor of praising our articles on the expense of government here and in England, says, "You have given an estimate of British expenditure in 1853, before the war commenced. You will oblige many besides myself, by stating what it was during the war. Also, by stating the cost of collecting the revenue in Ireland."

The expenditure in 1853, was £55,000,000. In the year ending June 30, 1856, it was nearly £92,000,000—being 22 1-2 millions pounds over the actual income. The difference was made up by loans and the issue of Exchequer Bills. In 1853, the cost of the army, navy, and ordnance of England, was £16,000,000. In 1855-6, it amounted, with three millions extra for additional war expenses, to £50,000,000. The cost of collecting the public revenue during the year just ended, was a little over four millions sterling.

A TIPPERARY MAN.—"Captain Rock in London," the weekly periodical you inquire about, was published by Joseph Robins, known as the proprietor of the Dublin and London Magazine. He also gave us Hardiman's Minstrelsy, and other noted and valuable publications. The editor of Captain Rock was W. J. Whithy, author of "Tales of Irish Life," and at present editor of of the Liverpool Journal. Of the contributors, the chief were Thomas Furlong, the poet of the Emancipators, author of the "Doom of Derenzy," and other well known productions. Dr. Shelton Mackenzie, with whose literary labors our correspondent must be familiar, Denis Shine Lalor, and other lesser known, though not less witty literary and political notabilities.

An ardent admirer of the News begs us to bring out our paper earlier than we do. "Indeed," says he, "if you could manage to have it out ten days before the day it's dated, the circulation would be wonderful." We shall seriously consider the suggestion of our friend, and try to make arrangements with Messrs. Cunard and Collins for the premature production of European events.

An interesting and well written letter, informing us of a discussion which recently occurred amongst some few intelligent Irishmen, and giving us the propositions discussed, has been received. We intend publishing it, most probably next week. In a clear, intelligent style, it suggests topics of research, study, and reflection, which are too often heedlessly dealt with even by educated Irishmen.

An indignant Subscriber quarrels with us for permitting the unfortunate Montgarret, the Bagman (our Kilkenny news-picker) to condemn the killing of Curley (the Crimean soldier) by a Tipperary militia-man. He says we oughn't to allow such things in our paper. Indeed! "I was on the point," he writes, "of getting up a Club of fifty to take a copy of the News, and now I won't." The Subscriber may peregrinate to Jericho, for all we care about him, his indignation, or his Club.

Palmetto. Yes, it's quite true. Bishop England did take O'Connell to task regarding his wholesale denunciations of the South, and the system of slave-labor.

Miss Esmonde will give one of her much admired Readings, from the Irish and American poets, at the Tabernacle, on the 30th inst. Dodworth's band has been engaged for the occasion. Full particulars will appear in our advertising columns next week.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 20, 1856.

PUBLIC SALARIES—A PARTING WORD.

Some of our readers may be interested, and certainly cannot fail to be informed—for such a statement has never yet been put into print—by a comparative account of the different salaries paid, here and in England, to the leading functionaries who constitute what is commonly called "The Government." The contrast tells very considerably in favor of the economy which we practice in this country—although, as we have repeatedly intimated, we consider that our official salaries are usually too low, and that, as a general rule, our instability of office, (which involves the dismissal of a functionary just at the time when he has fully mastered all the details of business,) is by no means an element of good government.

Reminding our readers that the annual allowance to Queen Victoria is £385,000, and that a balance distributed among her husband, mother, uncle, and other members of the Royal Family of England makes an annual sum of about £600,000, "for the support of the honor and dignity of the Crown," we have to pass on to the respective salaries of the leading members of the Cabinets of Washington and London. For the convenience of reference and comparison, we shall reduce the English pounds into American dollars, all through this statement.

The Executive Government of America consists of the President, the four Secretaries of State, (the Treasury, War, the Navy, and the Interior,) with the Postmaster General, and the Attorney-General. The respective salaries are,—to the President, $25,000 a year; to each of the seven others, $8,000,—total $81,000 per annum. The Executive Government, or Cabinet of England, consists of the First Lord of the Treasury, (whose duties and powers are in some respects co-equal with and in others superior to those of the American President,) his salary also being $25,000 a year. His colleagues, arbitrarily varying from ten to sixteen in number, hold the highest offices of State. The following are invariably members of the British Cabinet:—the Chancellor of the Exchequer; the four Secretaries of State (i. e. for the Home, Foreign, Colonial, and War Departments;) the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Lord Chancellor, (who also presides in the House of Lords, as our own Vice-President does in the Senate,) the Lord President of the Council; the Privy Seal; the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; the Chief Commissioner of Woods and Forests; the President of the Board of Trade; Postmaster-General, and President of Board of Control. The Marquis of Landsdowne is a Cabinet minister without office or salary.

Let us now show, precisely, what is paid to the different Cabinets of America and England. We may as well add the names of the parties, taking the American Almanac for 1856, and DOD'S Parliamentary Companion, as respectively supplying official and accurate lists.

	Annual Salary.
President, Franklin Pierce,	$25,000
Secretary of the Treasury, W. L. Marcy,	8,000
Secretary of War, J. Guthrie,	8,000
Secretary of the Navy, J. Davis,	8,000
Secretary of the Interior, J. C. Dobbin,	8,000
Postmaster General, J. Campbell,	8,000
Attorney General, C. Cushing,	8,000

Add to this $8,000 per annum to the Vice-President, (though his position and functions scarcely place him among the actual Executive,) and the entire amount paid, in salaries and allowances to our Chief Magistrate and his Cabinet is only $89,000 a year.

Let us now take the English Prime Minister, (he is an Irishman, by the way,) and see what he and his immediate colleagues receive.

	Annual Salary.
First Lord of the Treasury, Lord Palmerston,	$25,000
Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir G. C. Lewis,	25,000
Home Secretary, Sir George Grey,	25,000

Colonial Secretary, H. Labouchere,	25,000
War Secretary, Lord Panmure,	25,000

Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth,	50,000
President of the Council, Lord Granville,	10,000
Lord Privy Seal, Lord Harrowby,	10,000
Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, M. T. Baines,	20,000

Board of Trade, Lord Stanley of Alderly,	10,000
Postmaster General, Duke of Argyle,	12,500
India Board, Vernon Smith,	25,000
No salaried office,—Lord Lansdowne.

Here, then, is a total of $295,000 annually paid to the British Premier and his Cabinet, against $81,000 per annum to the President of the United States and his colleagues in the Executive Government. Large as is the first-named amount, it by no means represents the whole of John Bull's expenditure on this head. We subjoin a further list, still putting into italics the names of the officers which, and which only, are necessarily vacated on a change of ministry in England.

Captain of Gentlemen-at-Arms,	5,000
Do. of Yeomen of the Guard,	5,000
Lords in Waiting, (eight,)	25,000
Treasurer of the Household,	5,000

In this list we do not include salaries paid to the Judges. Our object being only to exhibit the cost of the Executive Government of England, with a list of the offices vacated on a change of Ministry, we have not attempted to "make a note" of the respective salaries paid in this country, to the assistant secretaries of each department. The occupants of these situations—equivalent in nominal rank and duties to the numerous chief-secretaries, junior lords, and commissioners of the English system—receive salaries varying from $2,000 to $3,500 a year. The balance is greatly in favor of America. In point of fact, John Bull has too many ornamental figure-heads—the real work of each office being done by the employées who have entered the office in youth, and have gradually risen, by seniority and merit, to the actual conduct of affairs in each department.

From the list which is here given, it will be seen that the persons constituting what may called the political government of England, annually receive salaries to the aggregate amount of $1,158,000; that the Cabinet ministers, sixteen in number, receive $295,000 of this payment; that ninety-five persons are the recipients of the full amount here given in detail; that sixteen of these, who hold their offices during good conduct (literally for life) receive $165,000 a year; and, as holders of office, are as secure (with the exceptions above stated) as the Queen herself, and that, consequently, the persons who necessarily go out of office, on a change of ministry, are only seventy-nine, while "the spoils" thus transferred to their successors amount to $993,000 per annum. The contrast between the comparatively small number and amount cannot fail to astonish our own noble array of office-seekers. One thing is certain—there is very little agitation in England at any time for a change of ministers. The "spoils" of office are not great, the wealth of the country considered; and the contest for position and pay is limited to a few leading politicians, most of them too rich to make mere salary much of an object, who seem to hold power, in alternate occupancy, as hereditary or oligarchical rulers of the country. That, which really excludes talent, unless backed up by wealth, is the blot on the English system, and would never be tolerated in a country really free.

YOUNG IRELAND FOR NICARAGUA.

Among the passengers by the Tennessee, for the path of empire which President Walker is clearing in Central America, was Michael Flood Nagle, a young Irishman of ardent republican faith, sound sense, and much military knowledge and experience. Mr. Nagle is well known to a large circle in New-York, and the numbers who attended him to the wharf was a gratifying testimony of the esteem in which he is held. He deserves it. He was connected with the '48 movement in Ireland, and, after seeking in this fair land the liberty denied to him at home, he earnestly entered into the study of those military affairs which he justly considered as the safeguard of the people, when in the hands of the people. In conjunction with Joseph Brenan, he organized the "Mitchel Guard," and was presented by them with a gold medal, on the occasion of his paying a visit to his fatherland. On his return, he organized the "Fitzgerald Guard," and on the resignation of John O'Mahony was unanimously elected captain.

In testimony to his practical military capacity, as well as on grounds of a more private and friendly nature, the Fitzgeralds presented him with a revolver, in the full knowledge that he will use it judiciously, in the new sphere of action he has chosen. An address, and resolutions of the most flattering kind, also recounted the company's faith in the courage and intellect of the young soldier.

Mr. Nagle also goes to Nicaragua as the special correspondent of the Irish News. The importance of the Central American Republic, and the movements which are transforming it from being the arena of fratricidal gladiators into the highway of the oceans, makes its present history deeply interesting. Mr. Nagle will have an opportunity of furnishing us with facts and observations of the greatest utility to those purposing to emigrate, as well as those who desire to read the history of Nicaragua at a distance.

CATHOLIC LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.

It is with no ordinary degree of pleasure that we announce the opening of this institution. All efforts of this character command our admiration, but this more especially, as it is the first in New-York, in connection with the Catholic Church. The object itself, or rather the objects, for they are several, are not only in the highest degree commendable, but deserve the encouragement of all who desire the intellectual welfare of the young people of our Church.

This association consists of about forty members, principally young men. It was organized in February of the current year, and opened on last Monday, at 257 Bowery. The objects are the dissemination of Catholic and useful knowledge, the moral and intellectual advancement of the members, and the creation of a spirit of harmony and good feeling, that will be conducive alike to their interest and pleasure.

The shelves of the library contain over three hundred volumes, of choice selection. The number is considerable, whether it be regarded as the foundation of such an experiment, or as the result of the unaided exertions of the present members, in the short lapse of time which has expired since the organization. These books, the number of which will be increased as rapidly as the funds of the association will warrant, are designed for circulation among the members.

The reading-room contains over eighty newspapers, from different cities of the United States and Europe ; and when the entire purpose of the association is carried into effect, it will also embrace, beside a great many others, all the principal magazines of the two countries just mentioned. For the present, it is open to the members from seven to 10 o'clock in the evening.

As one dollar a year is all that is required to give any individual the full benefit of these advantages, too much cannot be said in praise of the association, or of the young men who have been instrumental in its establishment.

The first of a series of interesting lectures will be rendered before the Association, on next Tuesday evening, by Dr. Ives. He will, doubtless, descant on his subject—"The Sources of Protestant Prejudices against Catholicity"—in powerful and eloquent terms.

By numerously attending those lectures, our readers will, at a very small cost, derive much pleasure, secure a fund of valuable information, and materially aid the Association to carry out their laudable projects.

THE DEMOCRATIC FRESHET.

Many—many of our readers throughout the Union have been present at the Monster Meetings in 1843. In Irish history, that epoch may be termed—the Year of Multitudes. Many of our readers have been present at Clifton, at Lismore of the Woods, at Tara of the Kings, at Mullaghmart of the Slaughter. Never before did such thousands, so gallant, so orderly, so proudly orderly with a conviction of truth, sway round a principle, like a mighty banner round its flag-staff, or hang upon the utterances of a single voice.

Many of our readers have read those powerful pen-panoramas given in Carlyle's History of the French Revolution—of the wild portentous multitudes, the massive democracy throbbing in thunder spasms through the streets of Paris in 1793.

All of our readers are familiar with the Paris of '48 ; for it shook not alone Europe into thorough wakefulness, but even turned the eyes (and in many instances the heads, then and for all time,) of the readers, artizans, and even brokers, of the Western Continent to that pivot of revolution.

Great as those gatherings of the people were, enthusiastic, proud, and portentous as they were, they actually were as much belied in grandeur as they are before in date the mass meeting of the New-York Democracy on the night of the 9th inst.

In some instances the numbers at the Irish monster meetings may have exceeded the gathering of last Tuesday night week ; the dense crowd that poured from the Boulevard des Capucines, bearing the bodies of their slaughtered brethren, may have yielded to every other feeling as they shouted "Vengeance"—the mass that measured the Place de la Concorde, and knocked at the Chamber of Deputies in February, '48, may have been more turbulent ; but if the effect or power of any such movement is to be judged by its peculiar relationship with the end in view, or the opposition overcome, then the torch-light display of the New-York Democrats, may be considered the greatest mass-meeting within memory.

Its effect is all the more startling in consideration of the period it illustrates, the ruthless opposition its members have quietly borne, the unmanly virulence so lavishly ejected at their chosen candidate for the Presidency, the amalgamation of the tag-rag and bob-tail—the odds and ends of all the political dissenters from the faith of the founders of the Union, since the Union was installed ;—it is all the more historic for that it swamps in its extent, and blinds by its effulgence all other demonstrations of the time, thereby linking the pages of the democratic annals, and presenting the only honest record of the period.

In its strength, in its brilliancy, in its good humor, in its stern sense of duty, the demonstration was alike remarkable!

A NEW FEATURE.

SPECIALLY COMMENDED TO THE GENTLER SEX.

In compliance with the wish of a large number of our subscribers, we commence this week the publication of a series of novelettes, which will hereafter be continued, with contributions from the most eminent authors. As these stories will be specially devoted to the illustration of Irish life in America—a mine of literature never previously opened—our readers must make due allowance for the inexperience of the workmen, nor grumble if there be but a few grains of the precious metal in the first few shovels full that are turned up. The "nuggets" will appear in due season, when the right kind of workmen get the right tools, and have learned their use.

Having said thus much in deprecation of any rigorous criticism, it is but fair to add that the author of the present tale, though a novice in this special department, is a gentleman who has made his mark in other walks of literature, and that the tale now commenced is, in our opinion, one of the most vigorous and exciting that we have read for many years. Its characters are boldly sketched, the plot is remarkably interesting and coherent, and the dramatic power of many of the chapters has never been surpassed.

HURRAH FOR REPEAL!

The last week of July, 1846, in one of his speeches on the noisy Peace Resolutions, Mr. John O'Connell, scouting the imputation that any Repealer could be seduced into the service of the British Government, emphatically declared, that he, for one, would never take any place or salary under that Government until the Union was Repealed.

The last mail from Ireland brought us the cheering intelligence that Mr. John O'Connell had been gazetted to the Clerkship of the Hanaper office, a comfortable situation for a gentleman of modest pretensions and moderate brains.

Mr. John O'Connell being a man of his word, we must conclude, from his accepting the situation in question, that the Union is Repealed. God save the Queen!

THE ASHES OF COLUMBUS.

General Walker on the day of his inauguration as President of Nicaragua, gave a remarkable and significant toast, which appropriately closed the festivities of the day. It was—

"The ashes of Christopher Columbus—which rest in the Cathedral of Havana—they should belong to America, and not to Europe."

The most exciting enthusiasm echoed the sentiment. Even in the growing emergencies which demand his busy brain in his adopted country, the General did not forget the welfare and the rights of the country of his birth ; nor could he see why the Queen of the Antilles could not preserve her "rare and radiant' beauty under the Republican regime of Uncle Sam.

"Coming events cast their shadows before."

Address of the Devin Reilly Testimonial Committee to the People of the United States.

The following is the Address submitted by the Committee appointed for the purpose, and adopted at the last meeting of the General Committee of the Devin Reilly Testimonial Fund. Want of space prevents our saying more this week than assuring our readers, that so far, the support of the project transcends the expectations of Reilly's warmest friends. We are in receipt of numerous letters and many remittances which shall be duly acknowledged.

FELLOW-CITIZENS—In asking you to do honor to the memory of Thomas Devin Reilly we are inspired by the conviction that we address a generous people, ever prompt to appreciate the efforts of patriotism and genius. We do not appeal to your sympathies, we do not solicit your bounty ; we ask a generous recognition of gifts as rare, a heart as noble, and courage as true as in our time have shed lustre on the land that bore him. His grave is far from the green fields he loved. He rests not with his kindred. Seldom will the step of affection wake an echo by his lonely tomb. He died young, alas! how much too young. They laid him in the resting place of the stranger, and there his great heart moulders.

Swift and sudden was the stroke of death. He had no time to make provision for his wife and child. He mutely blessed them, and that was all. He, their sole support, the source of their pride and joy and love, was stricken down in his hour of prime, and they found themselves alone in the world. In one respect that source is dried up for ever ; in all others it is immortal. We, who loved him in life and love him in death, fondly desire to alleviate their lot and soothe their sorrow. We purpose to erect over him a simple tomb, whereon will be told who lies beneath, where and when he was born, when he died, how manfully he strove and what great aim it was for which he struggled, was exiled, and died.

To his child nothing can make compensation for the father's smile, now dimmed in death, the father's love, now cold in the grave.' But those who knew him, those who cherished his gallant heart and the holy cause for which it was worked and broken, as well as all who admire genius and a noble nature, will take pride in providing for her a home, wherein she will have ever present to her how well her father had deserved and how highly he was prized. Such a memorial will at once attest the worth of the dead, and the abiding friendship of the living. In this undertaking, so gratifying and of such noble utility, we earnestly invite every generous mind to co-operate.

The father of Thomas Devin Reilly was a man of stern character and indomitable energy. He was affluent and spared neither care nor expense in the education of his favorite son, for whom he had hopes of station, fortune and eminence. The boy availed himself of his opportunities with great avidity. At a very early age his intellect became not alone expanded and cultivated but matured. His love of science developed the sterner faculties of his mind, and stamped its impress on its character. No love-sick strains occupied his youthful and ardent fancy. He longed to grapple with the stormy thoughts and aspirations of men. He yearned to sound the depths of the men and circumstances of his time, and take his stand beside those who shared his heart's deep purpose.

Immediately after he had entered Dublin College, the soul of Ireland had been stirred to its profoundest depths by the wonderful eloquence of O'Connell and the passionate muse of Thomas Davis. The strong purposes of the people swelled in harmony with song and speech of fire. The young student looked on, panting to mingle in and swell the surge of rising passion. At one side was his father's immutable will, the inducements of a literary life, and the brilliant distinctions it held out. At the other was a noble cause, hallowed by genius and inspired by the purest patriotism. There was, also, what was equally alluring, a prospect of peril, which may result in victory and liberty or a glorious death. These temptations the student could not long resist. He knew well that one step taken in opposition to his father's will was never to be retraced. He knew that nothing could be more disagreeable to him than his engaging in the struggle that roused the young energies of his soul, and if any thing could enhance the cause he longed so ardently to espouse it was the conviction that in doing so he sacrificed all he had in life.

He was soon in council with the Young Ireland party. Their master spirit had just then sunk into the tomb. Almost the first effort of the student was an essay in the Nation, reviewing Louis Blanc's celebrated L'histoire de Dix Ans. It was evident his fiery soul had fed upon the matchless heroism and unequalled suffering so nobly and adequately depicted in that extraordinary book. The inspiration, enthusiasm and coloring of flame, which in the passionate strain of the young French historian prefigured, prophesied and created a revolution, glowed anew from the pen of the still younger Dublin student. The brilliancy, vigor and fervor of the essays astonished and delighted the country. But the astonishment of the Young Ireland circle was supreme when the author, quite a lad, with an open, artless face, was introduced among them.

He was at once installed as one of the writers of the Nation, where he contracted with John Mitchel a most ardent friendship. Both left the Nation together, and both started together the United Irishman, that unrivalled journal which, from the outset, engrossed the attention of government and people, and inaugurated a new era. The result is known. When John Mitchel stood in Green-street Dock, where Robert Emmet stood nearly half a century before, and addressed his last grand appeal to his country, he took his ring from his finger and handed it to Devin Reilly.

Reilly felt the proud obligation this imposed on him. In a week the Felon was started, under the responsible ownership of John Martin. In this paper, Reilly, stung by the fate of his friend, hurled bolts of red hot fire at the head of the Viceroy. A warrant was issued for Mr. Martin, who in order to publish another number of the Felon, secreted himself for a few days. Reilly, availing himself of his absence, wrote a letter to the Attorney-General, avowing the authorship of the "Treason-Felony," and delivered it at Dublin Castle with his own hand, on hearing of which Martin instantly surrendered himself.

When O'Brien made his appearance in Tipperary, about a fortnight after Martin's arrest and the suppression of the Felon, Reilly set out alone, and travelled day and night till he joined him. O'Brien's prospects were already blighted ; Reilly separated from him, and journeyed hundreds of miles over moor and mountain, endeavoring to rouse the broken energies of the people. Baffled at every point, he determined to yield to his fate, and it was with great difficulty he was induced to leave the country and save himself. He reached Dublin in safety, and escaped thence to New-York, where he arrived in November, 1848.

In January, 1849, he undertook the editorship of the People, in connection with William E. Robinson. The People at once attracted attention. It was distinguished by a bold and comprehensive philosophy. In the Spring of 1849 the surge of revolution swept over Hungary, Italy, and Sicily. Thrones crumbled, and tyrants fled aghast. The genius of Reilly compassed the vast upheaving of nations, and the aspirations of struggling millions found expression through his pen. At the end of about six months he separated from Mr. Robinson, and soon afterwards the People ceased to appear.

Becoming connected with the Democratic Review in 1852, true to his fearless disposition, he struck out a new track, assailed and shattered old organizations, trampled on venerable conventionalities, and vindicated for Democracy a bold, Catholic and lofty mission. His influence was felt, and his spirit thrilled from ocean to ocean. Neither old forms, nor old ideas, nor old politicians could withstand his haughty scorn. In consequence of the services he thus rendered, in exalting and purifying Democracy, he was appointed by General Pierce to an office in the Public Land Department, which he filled till his death. He died on the 6th of March, 1854, and was buried in St. Matthew's Church-yard, where his grave is yet without a slab or a name.

Among the shining qualities of Thomas Devin Reilly, that which most endeared him to his friends was extreme unselfishness. His heart was gentle and soft as a woman's, and his strength of purpose as irrepressible as a giant's might. He would play with a child and wrestle with a demon. He knew nothing as his own, even himself. His imagination was fruitful as the bosom of June, and even in the bolts of his anger flashed the light of a kind and generous nature. In his heart nothing narrow or sectional found room. His genius belonged to all lands and all men.

Nor is our appeal made to any section of the people. His ablest efforts were for America. We appeal to Americans, we appeal to all ; not, as we have said, in the name of the orphan and the widow, but in the name of honor, of genius, and a noble heart.

THE FORTUNES OF CASEMENT O'REILLY.

HIS ADVENTURES IN AMERICA.

BY GARLAND O'HALLORAN.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY AND GENERAL. A PRODIGAL FOR WHOSE RETURN NO FATTED CALF WAS KILLED.

"The good old man was murdered:—he lay down
Beside the hope that had been struck to earth,
And died without a murmur. Yet his eyes,
Piercing the darkness death had gathered round,
Looked far beyond, and saw that wounded hope
Arise triumphant o'er the smiter's tomb."—Ford.

Every house, we are told, has its skeleton—not such a grisly thing of bones and integuments as "Shamrock" would delight to anatomise—but some topic or some name with which dark memories are associated.

Even the stately home of Castleronan, with its walled park and belt of circling trees—the river which curved majestically round the base of its lawn, and the conservatories which glittered amid the blushing gardens in its rear—even Castleronan was not without a skeleton, which came to life at the moment least opportune and least expected.

Hugh O'Reilly, the grandfather of our hero, died at a good old age, leaving two sons surviving him. Matthew, the elder of these, had long been a wanderer from home. His disposition was violent and headstrong in the extreme—so much so, that many attributed his irregularities to the insanity which had occasionally appeared in some members of his mother's family.

At last, after many outbreaks, which his father made great sacrifices to conceal, it became necessary (on account of gambling transactions inconsistent with honor, and a fatal duel therefrom arising,) that Matthew should betake himself for awhile to some foreign land. He departed, cursing the father whose tenderness had seriously involved the property in efforts to supply his son's extravagance, and vowing vengeance against his younger brother, Burrowes, whose gentle and honorable nature he regarded as a perpetual and designed reproach.

After quitting Ireland, he was only heard of through the family solicitor, who had charge of his yearly allowance. This was remitted to him for some years in different parts of Europe; but the letter acknowledging intelligence of his father's death was dated from somewhere near New-York, and spoke of his immediate return to take possession of the estate which, being entailed, must of necessity devolve on him alone. The tone of this letter disgusted even the attorney. It exulted in the death of his too-indulgent father, and still more in the ability which its writer now possessed to make the younger brother feel the extent of enmity his virtues had provoked.

But months passed by, and still no Matthew returned. The season had been signalized as one of great maritime disaster, both on the American and British coasts; and when a second year had elapsed without bringing any tidings of the missing heir, it became universally believed that he must have perished at sea, and letters of administration were granted to Burrowes O'Reilly, the younger brother, who entered on the provisional proprietorship of the estate.

At first, Burrowes regarded himself as merely a locum tenens for his brother. His expenditures scarcely exceeded the per centage allowable to a common agent; and for years he held himself prepared to give an account of his stewardship, should his brother hereafter appear to claim his own. But as years slipped by without a word, it seemed absurd any longer to suppose that Matthew could have been detained by any accident short of death; and at the end of the tenth year—though, even then, not without misgivings—the younger brother entered on the proprietorship of Castleronan in his own name, having by his past economy cleared off the incumbrances with which the elder's extravagance and his father's indulgence had burdened the estate.

During his father's life-time Burrowes had married a Miss Casement, sister to the priest of Ronanstown, and by her he had one son, with whose fortunes this true story has to deal. While his wife lived, she had always a firm faith that the elder brother would return to claim his own; and on her death-bed she cautioned him not to educate their child in the hope of inheriting the property, of which he was the apparent heir.

This advice was in a great part forgotten, as further years passed by and still no incident occurred to raise a doubt of Matthew's death. Young Casement was his father's idol, and a general favorite with the country round. His will was law; his every whim became an order; and in College, at the meet, or in the hurling match, his handsome person and fine qualities of heart and intellect established an ascendancy which few could successfully dispute. In the drawing-room or at the wake he was equally at home; and had not his endowments been of a superior order, he must assuredly have fallen a victim to the general conspiracy which seemed made to spoil him.

In his twentieth year, Casement met with Lady Alice Rochefort, the youngest and loveliest of a numerous sisterhood, whose father had retired to Ireland, partly to nurse his fortune (threatened with financial marasmus) and partly in the hope that the brilliant beauty and accomplishments which had found no market, during three successive seasons at Almack's, might meet with better luck amongst our more susceptible and less prudent race. Lovely, indeed, was Lady Alice; and though several years older than our hero, in fact, and old enough to be his mother, in experience,—he was quickly on the list of her adorers, and being apparently the richest was soon her favored and accepted lover.

In vain had Father Casement, his uncle and former tutor, remonstrated and pleaded that the attachment was one of those mere boyish fancies, as incidental to adolescence as are whooping cough and the measles to children. In vain had he pointed out that Lady Alice was one of those brilliant but heartless intriguers, whose only object in entrapping the boy was to secure an establishment for the support of her hereditary pride. Casement's father looked at all things from his son's point of vision—his affection colored all things with the love he bore his son; and as for the young man himself, he, of course, considered Lady Alice as the one pearl for the possession of which a kingdom might be cheaply given; he was dazzled by her beauty, entranced by her condescension, and filled with a sense of his own unworthiness by the exhibition of accomplishments which a little more knowledge of the world would have taught him to regard as the ordinary stock in trade wherewith every "marriageable miss," of like rank, is endowed preparatory to her entrance on the Hymenial steeple-chase.

Thus matters stood, when a letter from Matthew O'Reilly was placed in the hands of the family solicitor. It made no allusion to his long absence, but contained a hope that the vast accumulation which must have taken place since his father's death would enable him to carry out a certain project which he had been nursing for a life-time. "Let me see," it concluded, "that whoever has managed the property during my absence is prepared to give a strict account of his stewardship. I have wasted enough in my young days, and will now exact the uttermost penalty of the bond. Tell this to Burrowes," it added, "and say that justice to my children will coerce me into legal steps for the recovery of the last fraction due. I shall return to take possession of Castleronan within three days from the receipt of this. (The letter was dated Paris.) Therefore let the house be cleared of all intruders; as, in the selection of my future associates, I desire to have a voice. The servants, however, will remain; but they must look for all arrears to their late employer. For the future I add a third to their wages; but shall dismiss whoever dares, within my knowledge or hearing, to allude in any shape to my absence, or to make mention of my brother's name."

Burrowes O'Reilly did not live to quit the home which had so long been thought his own. His nervous organization had never recovered the shock of his wife's death; and the abruptness with which this news was communicated developed an appoplectic tendency, of which his doctors had long been afraid.

"His children!" he exclaimed, as he fell back in his chair, after hearing the dreadful letter; "his children! Then Casement is a beggar. Oh, wife—wife—wife! your last words were prophetic. But it is false!" he cried, starting to his feet, as if with a last inspiration; "I know that my son is the only heir of the O'Reilly's."

Those were the last words he ever spoke; and the superstitions of the peasantry did not fail to invest them with that mystical significance which we are all more or less inclined to attach even to the commonest utterance to which Death has affixed his seal.

As Matthew entered the avenue to take possession, he was stopped and forced to turn back by the hearse which bore his brother to the grave. He did not join the procession, in which the whole country took part, but waited outside the gate until it had passed, and then drove up to the main entrance of the deserted house.

Not a servant appeared in answer to his impatient summons—not a stable-boy remained upon the premises to bid him welcome.

"They have gone to the funeral, I suppose," he muttered, as he paid the postillion, and assisted two dark-complexioned children to alight from the chaise. To be the children of a man of his age, they seemed strangely young; and how completely foreign were their features! Nevertheless they did look something like him—with the addition of a cunning, which his grave, stern features lacked. "Not a villain of them all turned back to give me welcome on the door-step! By the great God, if it were not for the personal inconvenience, I would kick every one of the rascals down the steps on their return. But patience! I have a settlement of thirty years to make, and a couple of hours can make no difference either way.

"Here, sirrah!" he cried addressing the postillion, who had just lifted two meagre carpet bags from the top of the chaise, and thrown them on the ground at his feet. "Carry those things into the hall, and remain here, in care of these brats, until the servants return. I wish to take a look about the premises."

"I'm afeard it's a long wait yer honor 'id be afther givin' me," replied the post-boy with a grin; "an' if by the brats you mane them childer there—an' I'd be sorry to think bud yer honor calls them rightly, seein' that it's yerself ought to know them best—bud if it's them you want to have taken care of, sure it's a nurse an' not an ostler that 'id answer you."

Without another word he leaped upon his horses, gave the whip a crack that made the old knock-kneed garrons do their best to imitate a gallop; and the last that the new owner either saw or heard of him, he was standing up in his stirrups, on his way to overtake the funeral, while he shouted back a prayer "that the brats might be rivetted where they stood until them that had been sarvints to the dead man kem back to take care o' them."

Hours passed, yet not a footstep broke the stillness of the avenue. The very dogs had been removed by the late tenants of the domain; and there lay the house wide open, with all its splendid appointments and furniture exactly as they had been left when abandoned. The funeral breakfast still lay untouched in the great dining-room; such of the beds as had been slept in still bore the impress of recumbent figures, and the room from which his dead brother had been carried out but an hour before, was still heavy with the damps, and dismal with the draperies of death.

The solitude was absolute, and the silence only broken by a quarrel of "the brats" as they contended for some dainty of the untasted feast. The scene could only find a parallel in Boccaccios' description of the Florentine palaces deserted on the approach of the plague. "What magnificent dwellings, what noble palaces were then depopulated to the last person! What riches and vast possessions of jewelry and gold, and sculptured furniture and raiment were left to no known heir to inherit!"

The sun went down, and still no servants returned with penitential apologies. They looked on him as the murderer of their late master; and had he offered to treble, instead of adding a third to their late salaries, not a man of them, in their then frame of mind, but would have spurned it as the price of blood.

He had promised to feast his vengeance by driving Casement forth from the ancestral home, but in this, too, he was disappointed. Casement had been taken home by his uncle the priest of Ronanstown; and the only one who returned to Castleronan after the funeral was the Solicitor to whom his unwelcome letter had been sent.

Matthew O'Reilly was a man in whose stern nature such scenes were not readily forgotten, nor would they ever be forgiven. The scowl of his harsh, fierce eye became daily more intense; the wrinkles of his brow and mouth grew deeper from that hour. His voice was a terror to the menials he was obliged to import from England; and never was he seen to treat any human being with civility, except on one occasion when a dark foreign-looking woman came down from Dublin. To her he humbled himself with the civility of a crouching slave; his words were in whispers, as if he feared the very walls would proclaim them, while her's were shrill and imperious, and though spoken in a tongue unknown to the listeners, her gestures made it evident that she threatened and defied him.

After her departure he was taken seriously ill; his frame, though it had once been of iron, was wasted and worn down, and quivered with exhausting nervousness. He shut himself up in the strictest seclusion; and, much as he hated the presence of any one not a servant, he seemed to hate the sight of his own children—"the brats" as they were now invariably called—with a tenfold abhorrence.

Things had been in this state about three months before the period at which our narrative more properly commences. Casement O'Reilly still remained a guest with the priest; and if sympathy could heal such wounds as his, he need never have suffered misery for a moment. But where was Lady Alice, and what became of all her blandishments? In the next chapter we shall probably be told.

CHAPTER II.

FATHER CASEMENT AND HIS NEPHEW.—LOVE, EMIGRATION, AND A SECRET.

"Let us depart! the universal sun
Confines not to one land his blessed beams;
Nor is man rooted, like a tree, whose seed
The winds on some ungenial soil have cast,
There, where he cannot prosper."—Southey.

"A secret in his mouth
Is like a wild bird put into a cage,
Whose door no sooner opens, but 'tis out."—Ben Johnson.

The month is September—time, evening—scene, a little room, half library, half parlor, in which Father Casement and his nephew are seated opposite a blazing fire.

Dinner has just been removed, and the host is now busily concocting what he calls his favorite medicine. Whatever be its nature, the quantity is distinctly allopathic. Lemons and sugarare among the ingredients used. They are deposited in a large bowl, and upon them is then poured as much water as will melt the sugar and extract the peculiar virtues of the fruit. To this is then added an indefinite quantity of some amber-colored fluid, possessed of a delicious and invigorating perfume; the little copper kettle is now removed for the last time from the fire, and while the priest pours in the boiling water with his right hand, with the left he keeps the large silver ladle revolving ceaselessly around the bowl—thus adding what might be termed a mechanical aid to the chemical assimilation of the nectar.

The compounder was a little man, whose rotundity of figure and thoroughly good-natured face suggested a right appreciation of those "creature comforts,"—neither very many nor costly—which Providence and the Canon-law permitted to his use. His face was florid, his cheeks dimpled, his eyes as black as sloes, and his fine bald head displayed a phrenological development in which piety and benevolence, acuteness and credulity, large reasoning powers and still larger powers of enjoyment, combined to form a character, respected by men of all parties, and almost idolized in the immediate circle of his parishioners and friends. A spark of comic vanity was latent in his nature; and it was told against him as a joke, that he had once given his last guinea to a fellow who either mistook, or pretended to mistake him for Tommy Moore. He never denied the imputation, but asserted, if it had been so, that the compliment was worth ten times the amount.

The nephew's left arm supported his head and rested on the table; his right hand played with the glossy ears of a spaniel, and his feet were stretched forward on the rug with a familiarity which betokened that their owner felt almost as much at home in the pastoral snuggery, as did Jack Falstaff at his inn. His voice when he spoke was musical and full—his person athletic and graceful, though wasted as if by recent illness; and his eyes—the only feature which a common observer would be likely to notice—had a sparkle and vehemence in their large gray depths suggestive of a nature at once passionate and tender, impulsive yet retiring, and brave as a lion in the field though timid where any of the finer sensibilities stood a chance of being rudely jarred His dress was careless, though rich; and his whole appearance had that high-bred ease about it, which degenerates, in the vulgar imitator, into downright and offensive swagger.

Judged by his looks alone, he might have been some eight-and-twenty; but making due allowance for the Care whose untimely wrinkles were traced across his brow, and which had given to his large firm lips their unnatural compression, a physiognomist would have set him down, and properly, at twenty-three.

TO THOMAS BUCHANAN READ.

UPON HIS DEPARTURE FOR ROME.

BY WM. W. FOSDICK.

Yet once again farewell! Once more,
Bard of my home and heart, good bye!
The bark that wafts thee from our native shore,
Is freighted heavy with my sympathy.

Go, gentle craft! May azure halcyons ride
The glassy surface of a stormless ocean,
And lightly lift upon the deep blue tide,
The Egypt lily of thy heart's devotion.

By the broad sunset ocean—on the chart
I see my sister, where the day dies out,
Like a sweet summer swallow thereabout,
She haunts the sacred homestead of my heart.

Now she is gone, and soon thou followest—
How lone I'm left, there needs no words to tell.
Heart of my heart—Bard of my own green west!
My Sister, Brother! twin loves, fare you well!

Ere I shall see ye more, this heart will pine.
Long sleepless nights, and solitary days,
And weak and weary moments will be mine,
Ere I again upon thy forms shall gaze.

The silken thread by which my life was bound
Has been spun off. I'm left a hollow shell.
My warp of poetry has been unwound,
Yet I must say to one like thee—Farewell!

Oh! I am glad to have lived in this day,
With thee to break the crust and sip the wine,
And see thy cheering smile, which comes alway,
Like the sweet light on this lone heart of mine.

Would that my lot were ordered so far blest
As to have been a creature worthy thee;
But what I am, dear friend, oh! let it rest,
Rest on the ground of one that loveth me.

I feel assured, should we not meet again
While we inherit these frail feeble frames,
That there is something further left of men,
Besides their forms, their manners, and their names.

Something that ties the heart with heart secure—
Something that blessing one, another blesses—
Something that makes us rich when very poor,
And happy in our mutual successes.

Young Maro! of Penn's sylvan scenes, thy song
Shall oft be chanted when thou art afar,
Where Susquehanna sweeps the sun along,
Or blue Ohio bears a silver star.

Therefore when Art shall come to write thy story,
And fame shall crown thee in the Roman clime,
Let me stand here a witness of thy glory,
Silent, save heart-stroke music beating time.

And oh! my friend, it will be so soul-cheering,
If thou wilt in thy memory retain
My voice, as if I stood within thy hearing,
Whilst thou art on or past the broad blue main.

Old forms shall rise about thee from the dust,
The ancient warriors and the mailéd kings,
Forth from its olden receptacle's rust
Art shall arise upon her Psyche wings.

Rise like a dahlia from Egyptian tomb,
Dark in oblivion's prison-caverns gray,
Bursting to purple life and beauty's bloom,
In the gold sunshine of our later day.

And thou shalt on thy country's record stamp
Genius on canvas, and enchant her lyre,
Touching thy torch to Rome's most ancient lamp—
Thy torch which flashes with Columbian fire.

Yes, in the old land, beyond the azure sea,
With thy soul's choice, its own snow-breasted dove,
I prithee, make this monograph for me,
Ben Adhem—in thy calendar of love.

THE MEN OF THE RANK AND FILE.

AIR—The Irishman.

The world is seldom just or right
To Men who fought in Freedom's fight.
It honors Chiefs a thousand ways—
Gives humbler heroes stinted praise.
On this I oft have pondered long,
And deem it both unwise and wrong.
So, let me sing for you awhile,
Of men that form the rank and file.

Oh, when we meet our Saxon foes,
And drive them from our own Green Isle,
It will be chiefly done by those—
The men that form the rank and file.

What makes a People truly great?
The power to guard or build a State;
With bare and bleeding feet to go
O'er Valley Forge's fields of snow.
Had Washington ne'er lived nor fought,
Such men their freedom must have wrought,
With Heaven's own helping hand and smile
On such a noble rank and file.

It is a glorious sight to see
A man of kingly pedigree
Enlisting in the People's ranks,
His only pay—a Freeman's thanks;
But Smith O'Brien and Lafayette
A name of fame and glory get,
While Men of equal stamp and style
Are found among the rank and file.

Who fought the best in Ninety-Eight?
The Wexford men of no estate—
And Wicklow's peasant son, O'Dwyer,
As brave a Chief as I desire.
Oh, had both counties brought in play
United forces for a day,
They'd swept the Saxon's many a mile
Beyond the reach of rank and file.

And when we face our ancient foes,
And drive them from our own Green Isle,
It will be mostly done by those—
The men that make the rank and file.

Phila. Sept. 11. GARRYOWEN.

THE DRAMATIC WORLD.

In all times, even those of Thespis, the simple announcement, "My Lord, the Players are here," was sure to arouse the interest of old and young. The Greek poets made the Drama a great exponent of religion and virtue, and in many respects Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides were the priests as well as the poets of their age; while Aristophanes was content to be its satirist. The French seem to have founded their Drama on the classic model of the three Greek Tragic bards. The English chose the more varied and capricious style of the libeller of Socrates, although we have seen the stately verse and frigid unity of the Prometheus Vinctus revived in "Ion," and the "Athenian Captive" of Talfourd.

That the Drama was originally a religious ceremony is evident, and the common verdict of our best Biblical scholars is, that "Job was a serious comedy." Benton, in his "Anatomy of Melancholy," has some facetious remarks on the short-sightedness of Satan in that play, which Coleridge has versified thus:

"Sly Beelzebub took all occasions
To try Job's constancy and patience:
He took his horses; took his cows,
But the sly devil never took his spouse.

But Heaven determined to restore,
Two-fold of all Job had before,
Doubled his horses, sheep and cows—
Short-sighted devil not to take his spouse!"

As they say at Waterford, we leave the moral to the sagacious reader.

With respect to the purposes of the Drama, no candid man can deny that they were calculated to elevate human nature, by exhibiting heroes and heroines passing through an ordeal of suffering, and by either triumphing over it, or, by resigning themselves to their fate, show a dignified reliance on the gods. That the Stage has lost somewhat of its severity since Æschylus, is undoubted; but it has merely travelled with our manners and customs. Bourcicault, Brougham, Sheridan Knowles and Baker, are not more unlike Æschylus and Aristophanes, than the audiences of the Broadway and the Bowery are unlike those of Athens. Human nature in an altered phase, still is exhibited—modified alone by the change of manners.

The plays of Orestes and Hamlet have many points of resemblance. Clythemnestra is the Queen of Shakspeare's tragedy. Egisthus and the adulterous King are almost identical. Even in the madness of the young Orestes, we recognised the germ of Hamlet's insanity; while Hamlet's father is another sort of Agamemnon. Nothing is more curious than to contrast the treatment of the Greek and English Dramatists. Shakspeare in his Troilus and Cressida, and Euripides in his Orestes, treat of the same age, and the marked peculiarities of the Greek and English mind are brought out in strong relief:—one has most Religious Faith, the other most Moral!

It is a huge step from the banks of the Ilyssus to those of the Hudson, but we must make it to say, that what has interested the world in all ages, must be an element in our social state, worthy of contemplation and record. In New-York alone, there are 20,000 persons gathered together in our Theatres every night, receiving their impressions of vice, virtue and history from our Dramatists. Hume and Smollett have not had half the force of Shakspeare in making history. He took the traditional view of his heroes from Richard III. to Henry VIII., and when Walpole endeavored to rescue the victim of Bosworth Field from the unjust obloquy of the great Dramatist, his proofs and his reasonings made no impression on the common mind. Shakspeare had drawn King Dickon as a crook-back, a tyrant and a murderer, and so he will remain to the end of the chapter.

Seldom has New-York rejoiced in more Theatres than at present. The Bowery, Wallack's, Burton's, National, and Niblo's, furnish the Drama and the Ballet, while the Academy of Music, Buckley's, Wood & Christy's, and White's provide Music for the million. At the Bowery, Mr. Brougham has succeeded hitherto in giving to the people excellent entertainments, in which he has endeavored to combine first-class scenery, dancing and music with a second-rate drama—doubtless intending by degrees to elevate the popular taste from the blood and thunder melodrama to wholesome plays. After a brilliant Summer season, he commenced on the first of September his Winter reign, with a new company, in which were retained most of the old favorites. He also has presented to us Mr. Davidge, one of the best low comedians on the stage, and who is engaged for the Gaieties in New-Orleans. Mr. McDonough, although a little too emphatic, is already a favorite with the B'hoys, and likely to remain so. Let us, however, warn him of "soaring and descending," as our friend Smith phrases it, "into the ærial depths of rant!"

Miss Fanny Denham is a very clever actress and vocalist, and improves rapidly. Nor must we forget the Mad'lles Henrardes, who are par excellence the very danseuses for the Bowery. A taste for the Ballet is inherent in the human breast, our friend Buckhardt observes in one of his charming little Fairy stories, that "no woman likes the world to see a better leg than her own," but on the present occasion we have heard the highest praises of their dancing from the ladies themselves.

Mr. Stewart, at the Summer Garden, has been gaining every game, by playing such trump cards as Agnes Robertson and Di on Bourcicault. There are rumors that he has persuaded Mr. Wallack to resign his command for the next campaign, and moreover, that Mr. Wallack will himself perform at certain intervals. We wish Mr. Stuart success.

At Niblo's the Ravels retain their old supremacy, and fill the house every night with the old tricks.

Burton has opened the Metropolitan Theatre with rather an indifferent company, but as it includes himself, Mrs. C. Howard, Mrs. Hughes, Fisher, &c., there are still great attractions left.

At the Academy of Music Max Maretzek has assumed the baton, and everything promises success. Like a prudent man, he has only taken it from month to month. The continuance therefore of the pleasant luxury of an Italian Opera will depend upon the public itself.

The Buckleys' new hall has been opened with a very poor burlesque on "Il Trovatore," but the fun of Richard and George is as highly relished as ever. Wood & Christy's are, likewise in full blast; and having now introduced them all to our readers, we may take a stroll among them next week, and record our impressions and adventures.

MENTAL REMAINS OF A POET.

In one of the latest numbers of Littell's Living Age (a work to the merit of which we have already borne testimony), is an article on Samuel Rogers, as a poet and a man, contributed to the Edinburgh Review, in the shape of a criticism upon the remarkable attempt by the Rev. Alexander Dyce, to record his "Table Talk." Some speculation has been abroad as to the authorship of this very amusing paper—opinion fluctuating between Macaulay and Charles Mackay. We suspect, however, that Richard Monckton Milnes, Verse-writer and Member of Parliament, is the writer.

It opens by describing Rogers' House in London, looking into the Park, in the library of which "Wordsworth, holding up the original copyright of Paradise Lost (1,600 copies for £5), proved to his own satisfaction that solid fame was in an inverse ratio to popularity; whilst Coleridge, with his finger upon the parchment deed by which Dryden agreed for the translation of the Æneid, expatiated upon the advantages which would have accrued to literature, if 'glorious John' had selected the Iliad and left Virgil to Pope."

Rogers, whose life was prolonged to almost a century, was the son of a banker; and we are told that "on seeing his son taking to poetry and fine company, the old man must have felt like the hen who sees the duckling, which she has hatched as a bird of her own feather, suddenly taking to water; and in his heart he probably agreed with Lord Eldon, who on hearing that a new poem ('The Pleasures of Memory') had just been published by a young banker, exclaimed, 'If old Gozzy'—alluding to the head of the firm with which he banked—'ever so much as says a good thing, let alone writing, I will close my account with him the next morning.'"

To poetry he took, very kindly and successfully; the success not diminished by his wealth, nor by the fact that he gave good dinners, and excelled in presiding over that charming, but conventionally difficult meal—the breakfast. "Will you breakfast with me to-morrow? S. R."—was his pithy invitation to a celebrated wit and beauty. "Won't I? H. D." was the congenia reply.

On another occasion, a breakfast party, one of the guests sang one of Moore's songs in Moore's presence to the evident discomposure of the poet. "Well," said Rogers, "I have seen the bravest men of my time: I have seen Nelson, Wellington and Ney, but our friend is the bravest of them all."

Here are some of the reviewer's new anecdotes—very fair specimens of a satirical mind throwing its discontent into bitterness of expression:—

"Franklin, in his autobiography, mentions a gentleman who having one very handsome and one shrivelled leg, was wont to test the disposition of a new acquaintance by observing whether he or she looked first or most at the best or worst leg. Rogers would have forfeited all chance of this gentleman's esteem at the starting. Yet there was something irresistibly comic, rather than annoying or repulsive, in the pertinacity and ingenuity with which he indulged his caustic humor. We will give a few instances; but the look, the manner, the tone of voice, and the precise emphasis laid on particular words, cannot be transferred to paper. So uncertain is testimony, and so frail is memory, that even the accuracy of the expressions can rarely be guaranteed.

"'Is that the contents you are looking at?' inquired an anxious author, who saw Rogers' eye fixed on a table or list at the commencement of a presentation copy of a new work. 'No,' said Rogers, pointing to the list of subscribers, the *dis*contents.'

"On entering Moore's parlor at Sloperton, and seeing it hung round with engraved portraits of Lord Grey, Lord John Russell, Lord Landsdowne, &c., Rogers remarked, 'So, I see you have all your patrons about you.' 'A good-natured man,' characteristically observed Moore when he told the story, 'would have said friends.'

"When he was speaking of some one's marriage in his usual tone, he was reminded that the friends of the bridegroom were very much pleased at it. Rogers replied, 'He's a fortunate man, then, for his friends are pleased, and his enemies delighted.'

"Whenever a disagreeable man, or one whom he disliked, married a pretty woman, he would say, 'Now we shall have our revenge of him.'

"He spoke to Mrs. H. one day of Lady ———, with extreme admiration and apparent cordiality; he then left the room, and Mrs. H. remarked that she had never heard Rogers speak so well of any one before. The door opened, and Rogers thrust in his head with the words, 'There are spots on the sun, though.'

"When a late member for a western county and his wife were stopped by banditti in Italy, Rogers used to say, 'The banditti wanted to carry off P——— into the mountains, but she flung her arms round his neck, and rather than take her with them, they let him go.'

'At a bachelor dinner where the attendance was scanty, he refused the two or three things that were offered him till the solitary waiter had left the room. 'Won't you eat anything, Mr. Rogers?' asked the host. 'I will take some of that pie,' pointing to a vol-au-vent, 'when there is anybody to give it to me.'

"Rogers treated Moore much as Johnson treated Goldsmith—rated him soundly when present for attending to his own interests, and did not always spare him in his absence, but would not suffer any one else to utter a word against him. In allusion to his restlessness, Rogers used to say, 'Moore dines in one place wishing he were dining in another place, with an opera ticket in his pocket, which makes him wish he was dining nowhere.'

"Rogers was unceasingly at war with the late Lady D. One day at dinner she called across the table, 'Now, Mr. Rogers, I am sure you are talking about me" (not attacking as the present version runs), 'Lady D,' was the retort, 'I pass my life in defending you.'

"When some one was speaking of a fine old man before Swift, he exclaimed in a spirit of melancholy foreboding, 'There's no such thing as a fine old man; if either his head or his heart had been worth any thing, they'd have worn him out long ago.' Till near ninety, Rogers was a striking exception to this rule.

"His own version of his nearest approximation to the nuptial tie was, that, when a young man, he admired and sedulously sought the society of the most beautiful girl he then, and still, thought he had ever seen. At the end of the London season, at a ball she said, 'I go to-morrow to Worthing. Are you coming there?' He did not go. Some months afterwards, being at Ranelagh, he saw the attention of every one drawn towards a large party that had just entered, in the centre of which was a lady leaning on the arm of her husband. Stepping forward to see this wonderful beauty, he found it was his love. She merely said, 'You never came to Worthing.'"

On the whole, the article is good, and those who do not possess the Edinburgh Review, will do well to purchase No. 641 of the "Living Age," in which it is given in extenso.

Wit and Wisdom of the Rev. Sydney Smith; being selections from his Writings, and passages of his Letters and Table-Talk; with a Biographical Memoir and Notes. By Evert A. Duyckinck. Redfield.

Christopher North once suggested that on the first vacancy Sydney Smith should be made Dean of St. Patrick's, as a witty and worthy successor of Swift. Kit was complimentary; and his recommendation should be duly valued as hearty homage to both the wit and wisdom of Smith. But if any mental likeness to the immortal Jonathan was a necessary qualification for his successor, then Sydney Smith never should have been, as he never was, Dean of St. Patrick's.

No two characters could be more dissimilar than Swift and Smith. Intellectually Swift's voice was that of the impatient thunder; while Smith's more clearly indicated the vibrations of dinner bells. The one, so to speak, would frighten sinners to prayer; the other would remind Christians of their duty. Swift had the restless variety and insurmountable power of the elements; Smith the more neighborly and self-satisfying sophistry of the earth.

The one felt that, like the storm, he was above men; the other, like the summer landscape, laughed cozily among them. Jonathan, from his eagle height, scowled down upon the world; Sydney, from his well-feathered dove-cote, cooed in its face.

Jonathan Swift was a giant, soured to be sure, but still so conscious of his strength that he never exhausted it. Sydney Smith was an optimist, and had every reason for so being, for he was the most fortunate man connected with modern literature. He does not come distinctly under the head of literary men; and probably that is the very reason why he succeeded so well in gaining that worldly success which so many greater, wiser, wittier, and altogether more able men failed to accomplish.

Mr. Duychink, to our mind, overrates the powers of "that witty scamp of St. Paul's," as Tom Steele called Sydney, but it is an excusable fault, and probably strikes us the more forcibly from the admirable and elegant manner in which the story of his fortunate life is told. Mr. Duychink well indeed may be pardoned for being carried away by the unctious waggery and sententious worldly wisdom of Sydney Smith; and it is only after a severe self-criticism we could find courage to look upon the pleasant divine with somewhat less enthusiastic gaze than that with which others view him.

Be that as it may, we can but heartily commend Mr. Duychink's labors, so far especially as the memoir is concerned. It certainly is one of the most elegant biographies we have read. It is concise without being scanty, and full without being tedious. It is rich, lively, replete with happy allusions to cotemporary literature, and evidences an elegant taste, judicious reading, and a more than usual felicity of style in the combination of his authorities.

The Recent Progress of Astronomy—Especially in the United States. By Elias Loomis, L.L.D., Professor of Mathematics in the University of the City of New-York, &c.: Harper & Brothers.

This, the third edition of Dr. Loomis' work, is greatly enlarged, and indeed mostly re-written. Astronomical discovery keeps pace with the progressive spirit of the day, and suggested to the distinguished author an almost complete re-modelling of the original work. During the last fifteen years star-gazers have been more assiduous and successful in their labors than at any previous period of their heavenly explorations. Within this period, the number of known members of the planetary system has been more than doubled. A planet of vast dimensions has been added to our system; four new satellites have been detected; and a new ring has been added to Saturn. Dr. Loomis is especially gratified in noting the progress, both in the facilities for observation, and in the number of acting observers, in the United States.

Summing up the astronomical efforts of twenty-five years—about which distance of time the first telescope, exceeding portable shape, was imported into the United States—he tells us that we (in America) have one telescope which acknowledges no superior, as well as several worthy of the finest observatories in Europe. We also possess meridianal instruments capable, from their dimensions, of being employed in original research. Our own artists, who have successfully manufactured refracting telescopes, have received the highest acknowledgements from European judges, and the observations of the systems are now recorded by a method known over Europe as the American one. Of the discoveries growing out of this activity, we are informed that of a large number of Comets "independently discovered on this side of the Atlantic," three were observed before they were noted in Europe. Dr. Loomis adds—

"The two Nebulæ which have been longest and best known, were never adequately figured until they were observed by the Messrs. Bond; and the planet Saturn, which for many years was made the subject of special study by the elder Herschel, with his wonderful means of observation, first revealed to the Messrs. Bond a new Ring and an eighth Satellite. The novel spectacle of a Comet divided into two nearly equal portions, was first witnessed in America; and an American observer has added one to the long list of planetary discoveries."

We join Dr. Loomis in the hope that the future progress of Astronomy will be not less brilliant than the past. The work is illustrated with numerous useful diagrams.

Confidential Correspondence of the Emperor Napoleon and the Empress Josephine. Edited by J. S. C. Abbott. Mason Brothers.

"France—the Army—Josephine," were the last words that lingered on the lips of the man of Lodi, Austerlitz, and Marengo. His dying words, they completely indicate his wondrous life. The half-smothered ejaculation affords the key to his ambition, glory, and misfortune. This fact renders the present publication of exceeding interest. In the letters of which it is composed we may find the pith of history, given in the clear, graphic and vigorous manner of the hero himself. "No matter who has the victory, give me the writing of the bulletins," Napoleon used to say; for he is the greatest historiagrapher of a battle-field that ever existed.

One of the most interesting, not to say amusing, phases exhibited by this confidential correspondence is the sententious amalgamation of the ideas of the moment. Love, diplomacy and war are linked with an effect at once picturesque, suggestive and laughable. Sometimes in the successes of his movements we may find the lever by which his loving considerations are manifested; while at others it would seem that the calls of the moment so absorbed him as only to permit the sending of an affectionate regard. Thus, while engaged in the Austerlitz campaign, he writes to Josephine—"I am in good position, and I love you." While writing from Augsburg, the fact of his sending "four thousand prisoners, eight stand of colors and fourteen pieces of cannon," allows him only to "embrace" her. After Marengo he prefaces the intelligence that "Murat conducts well," with his "most affectionate regards;" and as a general resource he on innumerable occasions uses "a thousand kisses."

Napoleon rarely allowed two days to pass without writing to Josephine; and there is much evidence in these notes to sustain what is claimed for him, in regard to his being a man of warm attachment and tender feelings. The notes are very remarkable when we know that they were frequently written on the field of battle, at the moment of victory, or amid the cries of wounded after the enemy had fled. The whole is admirably printed.

The Last of the Foresters; or, Humors of the Border; a story of the old Virginia Frontier: By John Esten Cooke, another of "Virginia's Comedians," &c. Derby & Jackson.

From the still growing reputation which Mr. Cooke's first work initiated, we anticipated a treat in the reading of the book before us; but we regret to say we have been disappointed. The author, it would almost seem, never looked again at a page after once having written it—which is rather an unwise determination on the part of a young, or even old, writer. Great, indeed, must be the hold of an author on public sympathy, before such carelessness will be tolerated. So much in the shape of candid condemnation. On the other hand, it is beyond a doubt, that Mr. Cooke possesses talent, a fine fancy, and a mind susceptible to the beauties of nature and scenic effect, of which "The Last of the Foresters" is evidence. He lacks, however, patience. Some of his groups are depicted with the true fervor of an artist. We sincerely hope his next work will repay us for reading this.

Hall's Journal of Health," for September, is chiefly devoted to discussion on Consumption, the Nature of the Disease, its Varieties, Causes, Character, etc. Two features of the article are—the writer states that Hereditary Tendency is not specially promotive of Consumption; it is more nearly a preventive; and that as regards women, marriage, after the age of twenty-five, is also a preventive. Stringer & Townsend.

The Life and Administration of Ex-President Fillmore, &c., is a campaign pamphlet of forty-eight pages, chiefly made up of extracts from "Walker's Statesmen's Manual," and embraces besides a sketch of the Know Nothing candidate for the Presidency, his message on the death of General Taylor, a review of his administration, and extracts from his recent addresses. The biographical sketch from Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper, of A. J. Donelson, also forms a part of this slim production. E. Walker.

Literary and Artistic News.

At the American Association for the advancement of Science, a paper, by Mr. Green, was read, intended to account for the turning of dead bodies in coffins. The present removal of dead bodies from city to country churchyards has made the subject of anxious interest to many families. Mr. Green accounted for the fact by the changing of the bodies into adipocere, the properties of which are well known. It is defined as that fatty and spermaceti-like substance into which muscle is converted by long immersion in water or spirits, or by burial in moist earth. The reader exhibited a large specimen of it and proceeded to give its history. It was taken from a coffin that had been buried in a very damp, clayey soil, through which the water could not soak. In the same ground another body of a similar condition was found seven years after burial—the body floating in water. In one of these cases the lower limbs were crossed at the thighs. The specimen exhibited was part of the body of a woman who died over seventy years of age, and had been interred seventeen years. The specific gravity of adipocere is from 782 to 858 thousandths. Hence it will float in water, and if a coffin is filled with water the whole corpse floats, and settles again as the water leaks out in a position that will be determined by the weight of its different portions. This, doubtless, accounts for the imagined turning of bodies in their coffins, and has led to the popular belief that burial before death is not uncommon. The escape of gases was formerly the theory to account for such turnings, but he did not think it is so satisfactory. The knowledge of this fact will prevent the occurrence of the fresh and unnecessary grief often caused by the discovery of these "turnings." The conclusion of Gibbs, who experimented in 1794–5 as to the formation of adipocere, was that it is formed from fibrine. Dr. Steiner reported a case of a body changed into what seemed to be adipocere, which was found in a Washington City graveyard, after twenty-five years' burial; but the only organ that could be satisfactorily identified was the liver. Here was a gland—not a fibrinous structure—undergoing this remarkable change. Possibly it was a case of fatty degeneration. The graveyard was very low ground, and the graves were full of water. He united with Mr. Green in commending Dr. Charles Wetherell's work on the subject. Prof. Horsford cautioned the Convention to be slow in admitting these reports of what are called human petrifactions. A communication has lately been made to the Boston Academy, detailing how the bones of an infant in Illinois had been converted into phosphorus. But a strict examination showed that, in all probability, there was no replacement at all in the case.

In transmitting the geological labors of Percival, the poet, to the Wisconsin Legislature, the Governor pays the following neat tribute to the merits of the deceased: During the month of May last, Dr. James Gates Percival, State Geologist, died, creating a vacancy in that office. By his death the State has lost the services of a faithful public officer; Science a zealous and accomplished laborer; and American Literature a profound scholar and gifted writer. His Report of the Survey of 1855 was nearly completed at the time of his decease, and was forwarded to me shortly afterwards, by Dr. Jenckes, of Hazel Green. I placed the manuscript in the hands of I. A. Lapham, Esq., of Milwaukee, to prepare it for publication, and herewith transmit it to you.

Newspapers are usually hard run for names, but those in Ohio form an exception. Some of theirs are original enough. There is a "Screw Driver," a "Warning Bell," a "Fountain," a "Star in the West," a "Forum," an "Aurora," a "Dollar," a "Rainbow," a "Touchstone," a "Toledo Blade," a "Torch Light," and "The Ark," among the Cincinnati and country press. There were some queerly named papers in Indiana for a while, but we believe they are all dead. There was a "June Bug," in Orange County, and a "Broad Axe of Freedom, and Grubbing Hoe of Truth," in Richmond.

At a meeting of the Dublin Photographic Society, Dr. Lover exhibited an apparatus for taking photographs by gas light, the main feature of which consisted in the introduction of a stream of oxygen into the flames of common coal gas, which had previously been made to pass through cotton and naptha with the view of surcharging it with carbon, so as to increase the brilliancy upon the admission of the oxygen. By this means a light of so powerful a nature was obtained, that, by the assistance of a reflector, a photograph of an engraving could be taken by the camera in a very short time.

Scene in a French Court—Government Regulations of Theatres in Paris.—Narcissus—Your Honor, I am a dramatic artist, and my line that of "lovers." I am forced to be excessively affectionate in my roles, but my warmth, my enthusiasm, in fact every thing which brings down the house is now sought to be turned to my disadvantage.

Judge—Explain yourself.

Narcissus—Why, I receive a hundred francs a month, and they want to make me pay one hundred and fifty for properties.

Judge—Properties? What kind of properties?

Narcissus—Kisses. (Laughter.) A hundred and fifty francs for kisses for one man; it's exorbitant. (Renewed laughter.) That, however, is the amount which Nalsin, our noble father, has the audacity to demand of me.

The Father—Stop, old fellow.

Judge—How is that?

Father—It is easily understood. In every theatre there exists the following regulations:

Art. 1. When the stage directions require an actor to kiss an actress, he must merely pretend to do so.

Art. 2. Every actor who shall kiss an actress without her formal permission, shall be fined five francs per kiss.

Art. 3. Pressing an actress upon the heart shall be fined two francs and a half.

Now, Narcissus has pressed my wife to his heart ten times, instead of merely pretending to do so. That makes twenty-five francs.

Narcissus—It's more than it's worth.

Father—Besides, he has kissed her twenty-five times, and no mistake about it, which thus makes up the sum claimed, namely, a hundred and fifty francs.

Narcissus—I didn't kiss her without her consent; so that I don't owe anything.

Father—My wife declares to the contrary.

Narcissus—That's good; do you expect your wife to tell you the truth on such a matter? I rebut her evidence.

Father—I demand payment according to dramatic usage.

Narcissus—Well, since you are determined, let's come to terms. I'll make a reasonable offer.

Father—That's agreed.

Narcissus—Well, I offer to return them to her. (Tremendous laughter.)

When the Judge had succeeded in restoring silence, he finished the discussion by sending the parties to their manager, desiring him to arrange the dispute. We hope the noble father showed himself magnanimous.

American News.

In Salem, Alabama, at a recent political discussion between Col. Yancey for the Democracy, and Col. Baker for the Know-Nothings, at the close of Col. Yancey's speech, six beautiful young ladies stept upon the platform where Col. Yancey was standing utterly unconscious of their design, and gracefully threw over him a magnificent wreath of flowers and evergreens. The audience arose with enthusiastic cheers. The Colonel made a touching response; asking for the national flag, he walked to the edge of the platform. Lowering it, he took the wreath from his bosom and encircled with it the spear head of the flag-staff, saying—"The honors and advantages that may accrue to me in this canvass do not belong to me, cannot adorn me as a partisan, but shall be appropriated as I appropriate this wreath—to the honor and advantage of a great constitutional party." As Col. Yancey closed, and the very welkin rang with the plaudits of the people, he waived the enwreathed banner over the young ladies and replaced it on the stand.

"Die Negerbosser," says the Richmond Examiner, is the significant soubriquet applied by the good people of Lehigh County, Pennsylvania, mostly Germans, to the Abolition party of the State, now sailing under the disguised flag of so-called Black Republicanism. It is a German phrase, and the translation of it, we believe, is—"The Negro Kissers." When it is recollected that the present Fremont party is only an extension of the old Abolition party of the State—the same thing with a new name—the epithet is not misapplied. Our native Pennsylvania Germans have a world-wide renown as a sagacious and discriminating people, and amidst all the serpentine twistings of the enemy they never lose sight of his track, and generally call things by their right names. The term "Negerbosser" is not bad.

Dr. Ramsay, who escaped from Savannah while awaiting his trial for forging pension-claims, and who put in circulation a report of his own death, has committed suicide. He was arrested in Sparta, Conecuh county, Alabama, under the name of Brown, on three warrants for forgery committed in that vicinity. While in jail, his father, in company with the Deputy U. S. Marshal, went there with a warrant for him from the U. S. District Court. The authorities refused to deliver him up, and on the 27th ult. they went to take leave of him, when they found he had taken the seed of jimpson weed in his coffee. He died early the following morning.

The Marion (Ill.,) Intelligencer of the 22d ult., contains the particulars of the killing of a runaway negro who had been committing depredations in Pope County. He broke into a farmer's house, maltreated the women and brutally ravished one of them. He was caught after an unsuccessful attempt on the person of Mrs. Jackson, and being identified by his first victim, a sword was given her by the people with which she furiously hacked and cut him, after which her husband and brothers despatched him.

Of the securities, there is in Michigan State stock to the amount of $22,000.

An Eastern editor says that a man in New-York got himself into trouble by marrying two wives. A Western editor replies by assuring his cotemporary that a good many men in that section have done the same thing by marrying one. A Southern editor says that a friend of his was bothered enough when simply found in company with another man's wife.

At Chicago, a few days since, Dr. Spannagal challenged a tailor named Schwartz for slandering his wife. Upon getting to the ground the Doctor refused to fight, though, as it afterward turned out, the seconds had not put powder in the pistols. One of the Chicago papers says:—Yesterday afternoon Mrs, Spannagal, wife of the Doctor, presented herself at Best's saloon, on Randolph-street, where Schwartz was fighting his duel o'er again to some of his boon companions, and reproached him with not only insulting her, but with being a coward, in having desired to fight her husband, when he knew the pistols were loaded with nothing but saw-dust. She then drew a cowhide from beneath her scarf and laid it on vigorously, cutting him in the face quite severely, and altogether inflicting a very sharp punishment upon him.

The Boston Bee of the 8th, says that Mary Leary, an Irishwoman, 20 years of age, residing in Woburn Center, near the bed of the old Middlesex Canal, was killed on the previous Thursday evening by a gun-shot, while a short distance from her home. She had left the house to gather some chips, and being absent a considerable length of time, her husband went out to search for her, and found her dead body lying near the canal bank.

The Boston Journal says, that Jotham Stetson has upon the stocks at Chelsea a schooner built for the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. She is to be called the Morning Star, and will be engaged in carrying supplies and missionaries to the islands in the Pacific Ocean. Her frame is already up, and it is expected she will be completed in time to double Cape Horn in January.

ARRIVAL OF SMITH O'BRIEN IN RATHKEALE.

The Limerick Reporter of the 26th ult. says: Smith O'Brien arrived by train on Friday evening. He was recognized at the terminus by a few friends who greeted him heartily on his appearance on the platform. As soon as he entered the town of Rathkeale almost instantaneously it became known, and by the time he came to Moylan's hotel the streets were crowded with eager faces anxious to see him. After partaking of some refreshment, he drove off to Cahermoyle amidst loud, long, and oft repeated cheers. Rathkeale was then illuminated in honor of his return, after an absence of so many years to his residence, Cahermoyle. On the occasion the town's folk seemed to vie with each other in decorating and illuminating their respective habitations. There was scarcely a building in the town unlit. About eight o'clock in the evening might be seen the fair inmates of each dwelling busily engaged at preparing and embellishing the windows, and shortly after the illumination commenced, when a sight presented itself to my view which I rarely if ever saw surpassed, either for brilliancy, regularity of arrangement, neatness, or multiplicity of lights. Some of the houses had upwards of 150 lights; few less than forty. In one window I counted 60 candles. Several tar barrels were paraded through the town, amid a considerable portion of boisterous cheering. Rockets were also sent up in every part of the town, which had a beautiful effect, as the night was rather dark and calm. Bonfires were lit and blazed away all night. Other fires too more numerous and more noisy, but as harmless, were observed, sometimes indeed behind the cap of an unconscious policeman while walking his rounds, who might turn to receive a volley of laughs for his expertness. Great excitement prevailed, and who would not find pleasure in Rathkeale that evening. There was nothing to mar the enjoyment of the multitude of promenaders while walking the streets during the earlier part of the night.

BIRTH.

In Madison street, New-York, on the 10th inst., the wife of Joseph O'Kearney, late of the city of Waterford, of a son.

OBITUARY.

Died, on Sunday morning, August 31st, Margaret Agnes, eldest daughter of John and the late Mary Crowe, aged 17 years. Cut off, in the spring-tide of life, just as her manifold virtues were about to develope themselves, her death has occasioned a void in the large circle of her friends and acquaintances, not soon to be filled up. Combining in her person all the graces and accomplishments which lend a charm to female excellence, she was not destitute of those more solid virtues which dignify and ennoble human nature. Pious without affectation, charitable without ostentation, she went about dispensing joy and happiness to the less favored children of our common Father. In truth, hers was a life at once so unobtrusive and useful, that we should more deeply regret her untimely removal from amongst us, were we not consoled by the reflection that,

"Her spirit has fled to that heavenly shore,
Where sorrow or pain shall ne'er trouble her more."

BUCHANAN AND THE PRESS.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer of the 26th, contains an account of a rally of 5,000 Germans in that city, who have formed a "Buck and Breck" Club.

Not a German paper in the State supports Fremont, and he will scarcely receive ten thousand votes in the State which is declared the theatre of his wonderful exploits.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE!—Ex-President Van Buren and sons support Buchanan.
Ex-President Harrison's son supports Fillmore or Buchanan.
Ex-President Tyler and sons support Buchanan.
Ex-President Fillmore opposes Fremont.
President Pierce supports Buchanan.
John C. Calhoun's sons support Buchanan.
Daniel Webster's son supports Buchanan.
Henry Clay's son supports Buchanan.
Commodore Stewart (old Ironsides) supports Buchanan.
Commodore Perry supports Buchanan.
Commodore Stockton opposes Fremont.
General Cadwalader supports Buchanan.
General Scott opposes Fremont.
Colonel Benton supports Buchanan.
NOW ON THIS!—William H. Seward supports Fremont.
Horace Greeley supports Fremont.
Henry Ward Beecher supports Fremont.
Frederick Douglass supports Fremont.
Thurlow Weed supports Fremont.
Thaddeus Stevens supports Fremont.
Stump Preacher Tyng supports Fremont.
And all the Abolition and Disunion crew.

The Washington Union is authorized to bet $5,000 that Pennsylvania will cast her electoral vote for Buchanan; also $5,000 that Buchanan will get 500,000 more votes in the whole Union than Fremont. The Union furthermore offers a reward of $1,000 to any one who will procure the acceptance of the first of the above propositions.

Josiah Cole, editor and proprietor of the Democrat, a German paper of much influence and character, published at Easton, Northampton County, Pa., explains how "accessions" are obtained to the cause of Fremont. He says that he was offered $,3,000, cash down, by Mr. Lowry, of Kansas, to come out for Fremont.

Thirteen acres of Democrats were measured off by one of the reporters at the Tippecanoe battle ground. We should, says the Cincinnati Sun, like to pre-empt, and lay our land-warrant on those acres.

A German club, says the Day-Book, in the Fourth Ward of this city (New-York), which has been supporting Fremont, has backed out of the nigger-worshipping Know-Nothing party, and gone over to Buchanan. They do not like a man who tries to stand on two platforms, and who announces that "he suits his replies to get the votes of all sides."

THE FIVE POINTS.—The following "points," which we find grouped together in the Troy Budget, have been made by the people of Georgia, South Carolina, Missouri, and California:

1. "John C. Fremont, several of his biographers say, was born in Georgia. In his native State HE WILL NOT GET A SINGLE VOTE.

2. "His youthful days were spent in South Carolina. He was educated there. Yet in that State HE WILL NOT GET A SINGLE VOTE.

3. "He married the daughter of Colonel Benton, of Missouri, and has resided there. YET HE HAS NOT FRIENDS ENOUGH IN THE STATE TO FORM AN ELECTORAL TICKET, AND EVEN HIS FATHER-IN-LAW WILL VOTE AGAINST HIM.

4. "He claims now to be a citizen of California. That is his State, if he may be said to have a residence anywhere. BUT CALIFORNIA, all his friends admit, WILL NOT GIVE HIM HER ELECTORAL VOTE.

5. "If he carries a single State of the Union, it will be Vermont, whose boundaries he never crossed, and whose people never saw him. Where he is best known, he has fewest friends."

The Democrats of Indianapolis are offering to bet that the Democratic ticket will carry the State of Indiana by fifteen thousand majority.

DISSOLUTION—LETTER FROM GOV. WISE.

We are permitted by the gentleman to whom the following letter was addressed, to publish it in our columns. We ask for it an attentive perusal:

RICHMOND, Va., September 6, 1856.

Dear Sir: On my return from a short absence I found yours of the 20th ult., asking my opinion on the question—"Would the election of Fremont to the Presidency bring about a dissolution of the Union?" My answer is, that the very spirit of sectionalism which runs such a mere adventurer as he is, in every sense, has engendered so much envy, hatred and malice between various sections and factions of our people, as to create a wish in the minds of many so strong for a dissolution of our blessed Union, that to tell them his election would bring that lamentable event about, would make some of his bitterest opponents vote for his election for the very purpose of effecting that execrable end.

This, above everything else, shows the wrong and mischief of nominating such a man by such a party as that called Black Republican. His election would bring about the dissolution of the American Confederacy of States inevitably. Why? For the reason that if New-York, Pennsylvania and Ohio were slave-holding states, and Canada were to assail them with half the violence and "all uncharitableness" which Black Republicans are assailing us with, there would be public war in thirty days by every patriot's time-piece.

Whether the present state of peaceful revolution, of warlike brotherhood, of confederated antagonisms, of shake-hand enmity, of sectional union, of united enemies, shall unnaturally continue, depends precisely upon the issue whether Black Republicanism is strong enough to elect John C. Fremont, with all the demon-isms at his heels! You may do what you please with this letter.

Yours respectfully, HENRY A. WISE.

THE ROYALTY OF EVIDENCE;

OR THE WORLD IN THE WITNESS-BOX.

Diverse as are the opinions of men even of the same age and country about subjects apparently the simplest and least liable to misconstruction, it is not to be wondered at that a universal concurrence of mankind in favor of any problem should be regarded as (to use a lawyer's term) a "royal evidence" of truth. Indeed, so conclusive is this concurrence deemed, that many theologians urge it upon the attention of materialists and skeptics as a resistless argument in favor of divinity.

In fact upon only two propositions can we obtain the universal concurrence of humanity; upon all other points and questions mankind have "agreed to differ."

In the existence of a Supreme Creator, all tribes and races of men concur. They give him different attributes in accordance with their peculiar tastes; but in the general belief that there is a God, they are unanimous.

In the efficacy of Holloway's Universal Remedies for the cure of disease, a like unanimity exists in the opinion of the world. All countries, tribes, and races upon earth employ these remedies and derive benefit from their use. Millions of savages to whose ears the very name of Christ has never yet been whispered, are familiar with the properties and powers of Holloway's external and internal remedies. The missionaries of health have preceded those of the Gospel; and in numberless instances the physical relief imparted by the former has obtained and secured favorable audience for the more abstract and intangible blessings which the latter sought an opportunity to bestow.

Our readers, when they hear that Holloway's medicines are employed by every people, and advertised in every tongue on earth, may smile contemptuously (as we did), and think the tale a humbug; but let them be convinced (as we have been) that it is nothing but the naked truth. Wherever types and printing-presses exist, Professor Holloway employs them to proclaim the sterling merits of his remedies; wherever they do NOT exist, he has employed accomplished interpreters, and established special organs to make known his discovery; tongues to which the Bible is a stranger, are eloquent with the name and fame of the great physician who has scattered gifts of healing over all lands and seas.

The world is in the witness-box, and gives enthusiastic evidence in favor of Professor Holloway's remedies; and let those who would impugn such testimony be cautious—for, in so doing, by a parity of reasoning, they strike at the very foundations of religion and morality. The world is in the witness-box, and gives its evidence for Holloway!—Boston Traveller.

CAN CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

To that portion of the human family afflicted with this horrible disease, this is a question fraught with serious import. With them it is a question of life or death. The failure of the medical profession, heretofore, to devise any means for the cure of this disease has invested it with a terror that accompanies scarcely any other chronic complaint. To assure a man or woman that they had the consumption, was about equal to saying, "Your days are numbered; you may as well settle up your worldly affairs, and make your peace with your Creator, for you must surely die with the disease that now afflicts you." Quacks took advantage of this dread in the public mind, and by pretending to be able to cure this frightful disease, gathered golden harvests from the sufferers, while in fact they were only attending them to the tomb. To so great an extent had this species of deception been carried, that the human family began to think that the medical faculty were right in pronouncing this an incurable disease.

CAN CONSUMPTION BE CURED? is still the inquiry of the sufferer, and the poor mortal upon whom this disease has set its fangs, like a drowning man, still catches at everything that promises relief; and it is well that it is so. Were it otherwise, any great discovery by which disease may be cured would be of no benefit, because the world had come to the conclusion that there was no use in trying.

Not long since, Dr. Wesley Grindle, a physician of high standing in this city, announced that he had found a remedy which actually cured this horrible disease. Statements came to us from the most reliable sources of cures which had been effected, and which were still being effected, and which were truly startling in their character, and we became convinced that there must be reality in his cures, and so stated. Since, we have seen the living witnesses of his triumph over the worst form of disease, and the desire of each and every one of them is, that we should make known this great discovery to the world for the benefit of others similarly affected.

With this evidence before us, therefore, we have no hesitation in saying that PULMONARY CONSUMPTION CAN BE CURED. IT IS NO LONGER AN INCURABLE DISEASE. This is saying a great deal more than we ever thought we should be able to say, but it rests upon positive proof; and it is due to Dr. Grindle that his discovery should be made known to the world. For the benefit of suffering men and women it should be published in every newspaper in the country. It is a shame that the success of Dr. G. has stirred up the malice and envy of many physicians of the conservative order; instead of this, he is worthy of our highest regard; and we predict that the secret of this medicine will, in time, be bought up by the profession, and prove an important accession to the healing art, and a specific for the cure of a disease that, perhaps, fills more graves annually than any other in the catalogue of ailments. The subject is creating a great sensation among physicians as well as others, and our advice to consumptive invalids is, that they lose no time in obtaining this GREAT REMEDY. What if they have been deceived heretofore? better be cheated a thousand times by mere nostrum-venders than once reject the means of cure when placed within our reach, and cheat ourselves of our lives. Though this medicine has been before the public but a short time, immense quantities are already being dispatched by mail and express to many parts of the country.

For the information of such as may wish to avail themselves of this valuable medicine, we quote the Doctor's prices, as follows:

One box, $3; three boxes ordered at one time, $8; half dozen, $14; one dozen, or any number greater, at the rate of $2 a box.

The postage in the United States, not over 3,000 miles, is 15 cents a box. In all cases where the postage must be prepaid, the amount should be inclosed in money or stamps.

All orders addressed to Dr. W. Grindle & Bro., either at New-York or Philadelphia, will receive instant attention.—New-York Atlas.

AMASA J. PARKER.

A correspondent of the Potsdam Courier and Journal gives the following sketch of the Democratic candidate for Governor:

I first knew Judge Parker when he was a Member of the House of Representatives from Delaware county. He was rather a young man for such a position. He was remarkably energetic and business-like in all his actions and movements. He is above the medium size, and strongly made, and admirably adapted to persevering and continued hard labor, both physical and mental. I then understood that he resembled the late President Polk, Elisha Whittlesey, and some others, in devotion to business, and that he was a most laborious and useful member of committees. Such are the real useful men in Congress. His standing in the House was high, and the most explicit confidence was placed in his investigations and opinions. The old members much regretted that the rotation principle prevailing in New York so soon deprived the House of the advantages of such a member. My next knowledge of him was in the Supreme Court at Albany. My early impressions had been that all the great and learned lawyers were from the cities. I then learned my mistake. I think he was opposed by a gentleman of the name of Munson, who has since been a Judge of the Supreme Court. It is true that city lawyers have the advantage of extensive practice, but learning, judgment, and skill have no special locality.

He was appointed a Circuit Judge, on the 6th of March, 1844, by Gov. Bouck, in place of John P. Cushman, resigned, and under the new Constitution of 1846, was elected a justice of the Supreme Court, in which capacity he served eight years. After his appointment, he removed from Delaware to Albany, to promote the convenience of the bar and suitors, where he has since resided. He has returned to the bar, and is deemed one of the most able and safe counsellors in the State. I am inclined to the belief that he is a native of Delaware county, where there have been many of the name, some prominent as lawyers, and all distinguished citizens. His collection of Reports on Criminal Cases is a monument of his industry and discrimination. He resisted all the fanatical tendencies and wild absurdities which the times generated in the Anti-Rent District. He is distinguished for frankness and sincerity, and for his generous friendships. No party to a suit before him has ever left court without commending his firmness, impartiality, and integrity, whether they concurred in his conclusions of law or not. Judge Parker is simple in his tastes and habits, and free from absurd affectation. He perfectly understands the whole machinery of the State Government, and is abundantly competent to discharge any duties devolved by the Constitution and laws upon the Governor. Politically, he has been a Democrat of the strictest sect. Such a man is a suitable candidate to represent the Democratic party of the Empire State.

MILITIA NEWS.

ARMORY MONTGOMERY GUARDS,
Philadelphia, August 24, 1856.

To Thomas Francis Meagher, Editor and Proprietor of the "Irish News," New-York:

Dear Sir,—As your invitation to all Military Companies in the United States extends to us, we would feel deeply indebted to your liberality, if you would be so kind as to give us a place in the columns of your invaluable journal for the following account of the "Montgomery Guards" of Philadelphia, since their organization in September, 1837, up to the present time, in whatever form your judgment may dictate.

This company organized in September, 1837, under the name of the "Montgomery Hibernian Greens," with Joseph Diamond as their Captain; their uniform consisted of a green coat and sky-blue pantaloons, with red facings. They turned out in great strength (in 1839, I believe,) and proceeded to Harrisburg, under command of Lieutenant Dixon, where they did duty at the Buckshot War. Their next Captain was Robert Flanagan, who continued in command until 1843, when John B. Colahan was elected Captain, Captain Flanagan having resigned. The Company, under command of Captain Colahan, were ordered out to the riots in May and July, 1844, and proceeded to St. Philip's Church in Queen street, where they were stationed, and continued to hold the church for twenty-four hours against an infuriated mob of three thousand persons, having, during that time, made several arrests and placed them in the basement of the church. In 1845, they changed their name to "Montgomery Guards," Robert Flanagan having been again elected Captain. They then, together with the "Hibernia Greens" and "Irish Volunteers," formed into the "Montgomery Battalion." Captain M'Geoy was then elected, and continued in command for three years. Miles D. Sweeny was now chosen and commanded the company at the Nigger Riot in 1846, in which they took an active part. James Harvey, their present Captain, was elected in 1847, when the company changed their uniform to the United States Regulations—blue. This company, together with several others, now formed into the 2nd Regiment, 2nd Brigade, Pennsylvania Volunteers. It is at present the largest company in the 2nd Brigade, numbering about 90 members. In 1854, they won a medal from the Regiment at target firing. In 1855, Coroner Delaveau presented a medal to the Regiment which they likewise won. Their Armory is in Military Hall, 4th and Master streets.

The "City Horse Guard," assembled at the Grape Vine Cottage, 45 Second Avenue, on Monday, August 25th, to elect officers for the troop. Captain James Murphy was unanimously re-elected Captain; and Augustus P. Green was elected first lieutenant, and Cornelius Horrigan second lieutenant. We congratulate the Troop on having made the above excellent selections. After the Company adjourned, they were invited with their guests to partake of a bountiful supply of refreshments by the newly elected officers. Lieut.-Colonel P. D. Kelly, 9th Regt., presided. Aided by Messrs. Green and Horrigan, the helmet and sword were laid aside, for knife and fork, and wit and song supplied the place of the "War-whoop." The Troop retired at an early hour in the morning, highly delighted with the business of the evening.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter, giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

A perfumed breath.—What lady or gentleman would remain under the curse of a disagreeable breath, when by using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers" as a dentrifice, would not only render it sweet, but leave the teeth white as alabaster? A Beautiful Complexion may easily be acquired by using the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers." It will remove tan, pimples, and freckles from the skin, leaving it of a soft and roseate hue. Wet a towel, pour on two or three drops and wash the face night and morning.

Shaving made Easy.—Wet your shaving brush in either warm or cold water, pour on two or three drops of the "Balm of a Thousand Flowers," ru the beard well, and it will make a beautiful soft lather, much facilitating the operation of shaving. Price only 50 cents. For sale by all druggists.

A CAMPAIGN TRACT.—CATHOLICS ATTENTION.

Hear what Pope Gregory says about the Slave Trade and those who deal in Slaves. Hear his anathemas denounced on all those who in any way COUNTENANCE SLAVERY, including, of course, those who, by voting for Buchanan or Fillmore, uphold the infamous traffic.

READ POPE GREGORY'S BULL.

THE CATHOLIC CLERGY

in America, entirely ignoring or losing sight of the above document, issued, only a few years ago, it remains for Protestants to publish the same for the benefit of none of whom would care to vote for BUCHANAN OR FILLMORE after reading this proclamation of his Holiness. They would rather vote for JOHN C. FREMONT, who is pledged to prostrate "THE SLAVE OLIGARCHY," and to extend the area of freedom.

FREMONT AND DAYTON CLUBS

can be supplied with the above bull, illustrated by a handsome cut of the Pope, surrounded by his Cardinals, engaged in the work of freeing a slave from his chains—in addition to other suitable matter, such as DANIEL O'CONNELL'S views on slavery; also those of other CELEBRATED IRISHMEN, together with a map showing up, in suitable colors, the Free and Slave States of the Union; all published together in an eight page tract, which should be scattered broadcast among American Catholics; it is a knock down argument, and must have a telling effect on that class of voters. Will be ready on Wednesday, the 10th of September.

Thousands of copies have been already ordered. Send early. Price per 1000, $10; per 100, $1 25; or 2 cents single. Each order must be accompanied by the cash. Address the publisher

Dear Haverty—I wish you to put down my name as a subscriber to Mr. O'Mahoney's translation of the Foras Feasa ar Erinn.

That is a book long wanted, and which the "Celtic Society ought to have given us long ago. If William Eliot Hudson had lived, it wouldhave been accomplished. And it will be no small credit to you, if you can bring out here in America a work long acknowledged to be a desideratum in Ireland; executed, too, by a scholar so competent both to translate and to illustrate it with notes, as Mr. O'Mahony.

I hope it is well advanced in its preparation.

Faithfully yours, John Mitchel.

Their Book Trade.

The old established house of Benziger Brothers, Eisiedeln, well known to many of the Hierarchy and the Rev. Clergy of the United States who have visited Switzerland, established this house in New-York four years ago, and they trust they will receive for the greatly increased advantages they offer, a continuance of that support, which for a period of over forty years has enabled them to build up, at the Pilgrimage of Our Lady of the Hermits (Einsiedeln) an establishment in which over four hundred persons are daily employed in the fabrication of the various articles that are used in the Church.

They desire particularly to call attention to their publications of PRAYER and DEVOTIONAL BOOKS, in German, French, Italian and Latin, consisting of over 200 different sorts. Being in immediate and constant intercourse with nearly all the principal publishers of Europe, they are enabled to offer a large assortment of standard THEOLOGICAL and LITURGICAL WORKS, among which are, the editions of Mechline, Paris, Ratisbone, &c., at exceedingly low prices.

They are also prepared to supply any of the English Catholic Books published in the United States, at publishers' lowest prices.

Vestments and Church Vessels,

and, in doing so, feel confident that their stocks is more varied and of superior fabrication than any of the kind heretofore introduced into the United States, and from their facilities for purchasing in Europe, are enabled to sell at a lower price than any other house in the country.

Contemplate the Life of Mary!

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing in semi-monthly parts at 25 cents each and under the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

Archbishop of New-York,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

OF HER MOST CHASTE SPOUSE

St. Joseph,

AND HOLY PARENTS

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its general appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably. Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

This work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

This work translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of their departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

FOREIGN SUMMARY.

BY THE ASIA—LIVERPOOL, 6TH INST.

SWITZERLAND.—An insurrection has taken place in the canton of Neufchatel. The cry of the insurgents was "Vive le Roi!" The authorities are in the power of the insurgents. The rising is no doubt in favor of the long-standing claims of the King of Prussia to the territory of Neufchatel. A later dispatch, dated Carlshrue, 4th inst., announces that the royalist (Prussian party) of Neufchatel had, by violent means, possessed themselves of everything that the Swiss party (republican) had succeeded in depriving them of in 1848.

NEUFCHATEL, Berne, Thursday, Sept. 4.

The insurrection in Neufchatel was a sort of petty Prussian coup d'etat. The Hotel de Ville has been retaken by the mountaineers. Twelve Prussians have been killed.

The royalists seized the chateau, arrested the Councillor of State, and hoisted the Prussian flag. The Neufchatel telegraph is cut. At Chaux de Fonds, and in the western portion of the canton, the population have taken up arms.

PARIS, Thursday, 8 P. M.

According to our latest news, the federal troops have re-taken the town, and the insurgent leader, Count Pourtalis, has been arrested.

AUSTRIA.—A letter from Vienna, in the Cologne Gazette, says: "The military measures that our Government is taking in Italy, and which do not merely consist in placing the fifth corps of the army on a war footing, have given a fresh impulse to the hostile sentiments of Sardinia towards Austria. It is stated that the Sardinian army is to be increased, and that Count Cavour has already addressed a note to the Sardinian Ministers at foreign courts, in which he declares that this measure has been adopted solely in consequence of the policy of Austria, and intimates pretty clearly that he will not tolerate a purely Austrian intervention in Italy."

FRANCE.—The cashier and sub-cashier of the Northern Railroad of France have absconded. A deficiency of 1,000,000f. has already been discovered in their accounts. A branch line from the Marseilles Railroad, to connect Aix, the ancient capital of Provence, with the Mediterranean, was opened with great pomp on Sunday last.

GREAT BRITAIN.—The Times of the 3d inst. says, the unprecedented circumstance of the suspension of a London joint stock bank took place this morning. For some time past doubts have been prevalent as to the position of the Royal British Bank, and a run has been going on, which terminated to-day in the closing of the establishment at about 11 o'clock, with a notice that business was suspended "pending negotiations." The capital of the bank is divided into 3,000 shares of £100 each, on which £50 had been paid, making a total of £150,000, and among many practical people an opinion prevails that the greater part, if not the whole, of this will be found to have been lost. Indeed, there are some who predict that the assets will fall short of the liabilities, and that a contribution from the shareholders will be required to complete the winding up. The bank was established seven years ago, with a charter from the Board of Trade, giving several advantageous privileges, but no limitation of liabilities. The number of shareholders is 289, and among them are many persons of property. According to the half-yearly statement submitted on the 1st ult. the amount of liabilities to depositors was £842,421, and its assets consisted of discounted bills, £810,204 (including, it is reported, about £250,000 cash credits), "investments in Government stocks and cash," £174,304, and property in buildings, &c., £23,680. At this meeting a dividend of 4 per cent. was declared, the rate previously having been 5 per cent. The unfortunate depositors are mostly small London tradesmen, who, embracing the advantage held out by this bank of receiving small deposits on drawing accounts, were in the habit of depositing the amounts to meet their current expenditure. The parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, we are informed, has not only lost all its parochial funds, but the balance of numerous charities belonging to the parish. At every branch large crowds of persons assembled early on the following morning, and did not leave till dark.

GREECE.—Letters from Athens of the 26th ultimo assert that perfect tranquillity reigns in that city, and add that the Greek Government has ordered the draining of several lakes, as well as other public works. According to the Moniteur Grec, French vine-growers have been engaged to form model establishments, destined to wine-making, in order to procure a greater extension for the vinous productions of the country.

HOLSTEIN.—The High Court of Apppeal at Keil has decided against the competency of the tribunal before which the Minister, M. Von Scheele, was impeached, and has dismissed the accusation. A dispatch, dated Sept. 1, says:

"Much dissatisfaction consequently prevails, but there are some who think that as the courts, as at present constituted, cannot maintain the rights of the State, the people must eventually see that there is no alternative but to take the decision of such affairs into their own hands. Under any circumstances, it is thought that another grievance is thus added to the number of those by which Denmark oppresses the Duchy, and that sooner or later a severance of the unequal connection which now exists must assuredly follow."

The Russian Minister of Finance has been authorized to issue three new series of paper money, amounting to 9,000,000 of silver roubles.

Six of the Madrid journals have been seized by order of the Government. The Gazette publishes the decree dissolving the constituent Cortes. Another royal decree accepts the resignation of M. Corradi, who held the post of Spanish Minister at Lisbon.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says it is certain that a second note has been addressed to France and England by Naples.

Foreign Miscellany.

M. Paulin, the director, and M. Busoni, the editor of the French Illustrated News, L'Illustration, were cited before a court of law to answer an action of libel brought by the celebrated advocate, M. Chaix d'Estange. It had been stated in that journal that M. Chaix d'Estange had opposed a compromise of the great Pescatore case, relating to the validity of a marriage in Spain, because the amount of his fee depended upon the result. M. Paulin did not appear, and after hearing a very few observations from the counsels for the plaintiff and M. Busoni, the court gave a verdict for a fine of 200f. and the costs in lieu of damages.

The Salut Public of Lyons relates the following somewhat romantic story:—a family belonging to the working class, assembled on Sunday in the first floor of a restaurant at the Brotteaux to celebrate the betrothal of the eldest daughter. The repast had passed over without anything to interrupt its harmony, and the bride elect was sitting with blushing face and downcast eyes listening to the tender professions of her future lord, when suddenly the younger sister, who had been eagerly regarding the lovers, rose from her chair, and after kissing her father and mother, sprang head formost from the open window. The greatest consternation prevailed; but happily it was found that the damsel had fallen upon some soft ground in the garden, and had received no material injury. On being closely questioned as to the motive of the attempt she had made on her life, she confessed, after some hesitation, that she felt a violent passion for the husband of her sister. It remains to be seen whether the latter will make the sacrifice, and whether the former will consent to the exchange."

THE MARSHALS OF FRANCE.—The Annuaire Militaire for 1856, has just appeared. At the head of the book, and immediately after the name of the Emperor, comes that of the Prince Imperial, inscribed as enfant de troupe of the first regiment of Grenadiers of the Imperial Guard, and the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor; then comes a list of the Marshals of the Empire, ten in number, including Prince Jerome. They are the Prince, Marshals Reille, Vaillant, Magnan, De Castellane, Baraguay, d'Hilliers, Pelissier, Randon, Canrobert and Bosquet. The Annuaire mentions that in time of peace, the number of Marshals is fixed at six, and when that number is exceeded, only one nomination to three vacancies takes place.

The Prussian official Correspondent says: "General Chruleff, who commanded a Russian division during the Siege of Sebastopol, was afterwards sent to the frontiers of Persia, where he appears to have advanced too far into the hostile territory. Cut off from all communication with his own countrymen, and threatened on his flank by immediate hordes of Circassians and Kurds, he found himself obliged to make a retreat across the boundless waters of the inhospitable sand steppes, and as nothing has hitherto been heard of him, great fears are entertained for the safety of the General and his whole army."

A man named Bonar, at Kennet, England, was lately fined for using a steel-yard which was found to be incorrect, and though it turned out that the inaccuracy of the steel-yard used had defrauded Mr. Bonar himself, the penalty was enforced.

The Russians have sent in a claim of 400,000 francs for damages done to the Russian palace at Constantinople, from its having been converted into a French hospital.

Jews have been declared eligible for public situations in the Russian empire.

At the meeting of the Liverpool town council, it was reported that defalcations had been discovered in the accounts of Mr. Beggs, collector of dock rates, to the amount of £140. Beggs was dangerously ill from cholera.

The London Chartists' demonstration in honor of John Frost, was to take place on the 15th inst.

The Lord Lieutenant has consented to lay the foundation of the Crimean monument in Wexford.

Loss of an American Ship and seventy-seven Lives.

PLYMOUTH, Friday Evening, Sept. 5, 1856.

The American ship Ocean Home and the cherubim, came into collision at two o'clock this morning, off the Lizard; the former sank in twenty minutes afterward, taking with her seventy-seven souls. She was bound from Rotterdam to New-York, with German passengers, who, with the crew and officers, numbered 105 persons. The master, Merryman, and twenty-one of the passengers and crew, were landed at this port this evening, by the Perseverance pilot boat. The master is seriously contused. The Cherubim received little damage, and proceeded to London.

The second mate, steward, and four seamen of the Ocean Home, got into the long boat, but their fate is doubtful.

Additional Particulars.—The Cherubim, Capt. Smith, of Richmond, U. S., has a general cargo and a number of passengers, among whom are the widow and five children of the late British Consul at the port of New-York [? Vice Consul], who died very suddenly fourteen days after sailing. The cutwater of this ship is knocked away, and some of the trenails and butts smashed, but she has proceeded up the channel.

THE STATE OF FRANCE.

From the London Times.

Contrast with English society the present state of France, as revealed in the intelligence lately received from Paris. Externally the great nation with which we are allied shows, like us, peace and prosperity. Enterprises of all kinds for material improvement are springing up in its capital and large towns. There is no lack of demand for those tasteful manufactures of which it has the monopoly in the markets of the world. The Sovereign has conquered a position in Europe, and receives the homage both of friends and opponents. France has again proved her power to stand first among the military powers of Europe. If we sought to imagine circumstances which should produce content on a people we could hardly fix on anything more favorable than the present condition of France—prosperous, honored, wise in the experience of many political changes, with a great mission before her, and conscious of ability to fulfil the highest expectations of the world. Yet we learn that this community is pervaded throughout by Secret Societies. Some time since it was stated how certain departments of France were especially imbued with communistic doctrines, how the principles of the Socialist writers were carried up and down the great rivers and the chief roads of the country by the class of men whose occupation takes them from place to place among a community which is stationary to a much greater degree than in England. The Society of the Marianne may owe its success to the ardent propagation of such men. The West and South of France seem to be the chief scene of its operations; for, unlike most of the associations which have hitherto influenced the country, it is not yet Parisian in origin, and it does not appear to have yet affiliated many of the working classes of the capital. The Marianne in origin and organization is the work of the provincial artizans, laborers, and peasants. The hardy workers in metal and stone throughout the country seem to be its supporters, and even more devoted to the cause than weavers and vinegrowers. Iron-founders, tin-workers, quarriers, together with all the race of bargemen and boatmen, are deeply implicated—"the manufacturing towns on the Loire, the Rhone, and the Saone, besides various manufacturing centres in the North, East, and South are incorporated in the Marianne, or at least closely connected with it."

Its principles may be well imagined. The Democratic and Social Republic for the end; for the means anything that may be necessary. This society, it is said, has now taken root throughout the greater part of France. We do not, indeed look upon its doings with the trepidation of some old-time politicians, nor do we think that its existence causes to the government in Paris the alarm that might be naturally looked for. These great organizations are, indeed, too unwieldy to effect much. They represent more the wide diffusion of unhealthy feeling than machinery of any definite moment. It is not likely that the Grand Master of the Marianne will carry out through his hierarchy any active plan of revolt. In the first place, these secret societies have no secrets from the police. With much solemnity of initiation and a great apparatus of signals and passwords, there is really little that the youngest disciple does not know. He learns that the society is to promote insurrection when the time shall come, and the chiefs themselves know little more. Out of these thousands of affiliated laborers and peasants there are, of course, many poverty-stricken wretches in secret communication with the Prefects and their officers. The police know all that happens, and possibly not seldom urge on overt acts when the time has come for a decisive blow. Of two generations of Frenchmen, vast numbers have spent their lives in conspiring, and yet conspiracies have not overthrown any of the governments of France. They may have been the expressions of that public feeling which caused revolutions, but actively and immediately they have effected nothing. Charles X. fell by acts of outrageous tyranny and folly, which raised his capital, both bourgeoisie and workmen against him. Louis Philippe threw away his crown by indecision at a moment when a word could have saved him. Secret societies could neither overthrow Cavaignac, nor prevent the successive elections of Louis Napoleon to the highest place in the state. There is, therefore, perhaps, no reason to fear a rising from the wide-spread association we have described. Its members will long continue to declaim in secret, to exhort one another, to drink together, to organize and re-organize with much minuteness of detail, but action will always be deferred to the favorable opportunity, which, in the opinion of the chiefs, will never have arrived. Yet the existence of the Marianne is neverthless a gloomy portent. It shows what France still is—how far distant may be the term which is to close the period of revolutions. The Marianne may never muster its hordes for a march on Paris, but so long as it exists, the land can never have peace. France must be always, as it were, in a state of siege.

The cultivation of Flax in the county of Wexford, on a small scale, has long been practised, but as engrossing the care of the agriculturist as a source of profit by sale, it is of recent date. The Cotton Lords, with their power-looms, had almost entirely banished flax, when the spirit and enterprise of Mr. John Rowe, at Mochorry, and the Messrs. Pownall at Wilton, by opening home markets for the purchase of the raw article in any state after being severed from the soil, gave a new impetus to its cultivation, and created an ardor and competitive spirit among our agriculturists. The men of the county of Wexford are intelligent, slow to adopt new modes on mere speculation—but steady and eager in the pursuit of what promises a fair remuneration for their outlay and enterprise. That flax is now a favorite in the county, is pretty evident from the increase of extent of land in 1856, exceeding by 726 acres, that under flax in 1855, viz: in 1855, 825 acres, in 1856, 1551 acres.

A dispute has arisen between the Guardians of the Castlecomer Union and their Medical Officer, Dr. Ross. Some time ago, the Doctor complained that he could not pass through the Workhouse on Sundays—as he himself expresses it, "what they call Holidays"—all the doors being carefully locked. It was ascertained that Dr. Ross was in the habit of attending the Workhouse during the hours which have been dedicated to religious worship. There not being the slightest necessity for selecting that particular period of the day, the Board considered Dr. Ross himself in the wrong; and accordingly, prohibited him from attending during the hours of eight and ten o'clock. He has put a notice on the books that he cannot obey the order, and it seems he is resolved upon coming into collision with the Board.

The ceremony of the consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Gillooly was to have taken place in the new church of St. Vincent, Cork, Sunday, the 7th of September. As the loved and honored confrere of Father Michael O'Sullivan, and then as his efficient successor, in the seminary, in the community, in the erection of the church, as chaplain to our lunatic asylum and more than one of our religious communities, the Cork Examiner says, that Dr. Gillooly has done solid service to Cork.

Mr. Caraher has moved, at a meeting of the Town Commissioners, for a memorial in favor of having Dundalk formed into a military district. The resolution was unanimously adopted. Mr. Caraher guarantees the morality of the town from contamination, and instanced Dublin, in proof of what he stated, as the most religious city in the empire, although containing a large military force.

The frauds for which John and James Sadleir have obtained so disgraceful a notoriety all over the world, have resulted in another bank suspension. The Commercial Bank of Newcastle-on-Tyne has closed, being unable to struggle with embarrassments caused by the Sadleir frauds.

In Kilkenny city, the other day, John Davis was sentenced to pay £1 3s. 6d. or be imprisoned for 6 months with hard labor, for having offered a Crimean medal belonging to Private Joseph Wilde, of the 50th Regt., for sale. The latter stated that he had authorized the prisoner to dispose of the medal for him.

The Rev. Charles O'Reilley, C. C., of Drumgoon, has got permission from the bishop of the diocese to proceed for a time to Australia, where he accompanies a gentleman who has come in for a large inheritance there. It is the intention of the parishioners to present him with an address and entertain him at a dinner on the occasion of his departure.

The Scots Grays, on landing in Ireland, will be quartered at Newbridge; the 16th Lancers move from Dublin to Longford, the 13th Light Dragoons from Ballincollig to Cahir, and the 17th Lancers from Cahir to Dublin.

The parties committed for a riot at Kilrush, on the testimony of "Denny the Dicer," have been released, by order of the Lord Lieutenant. The Telegraph says it is owing to the letters of Rev. Dr. Cahill.

On his return from Galway, Smith O'Brien passed the Ballinasloe station. During the few minutes the train stopped he walked out on the platform, and was at once recognized by the Earl of Clancarty, who shook hands with him very cordially.

A medical officer for the workhouse of the Dudalk Union was elected by the board of guardians on Tuesday, in the person of Dr. Jones, of Drumconrath Dispensary, who had a majority of one over Dr. Crinian.

Irish News.

A few Yorkshiremen lately left Belfast for Liverpool, taking with them a quantity of green rushes, made up into neat bundles. These rushes are dried and sent up to the southern districts, to be used as rush-lights. They are extensively used in London, Manchester, and other large manufacturing towns, by the poorer classes of the people. The rushes in question were cut in the swampy land nearest the town, so that, as the Belfast Mercury observes, what many consider a nuisance can be easily made profitable as a commodity for export.

Sixty-eight men who volunteered to fight under the banner of the gallant 18th Royal Irish, previous to their departure from Chatham for the Crimea, have rejoined the left wing of Her Majesty's 49th Regiment, at Buttevant. Major Kirby opened the ranks, and as each decorated file marched down, they were enthusiastically cheered by their old and young comrades. The men, although sun-burnt and weather-beaten, with huge patriarchal beards and moustaches, were in the enjoyment of good health. The 94th welcomed back their undaunted comrades to Buttevant, with demonstrations of joy, and a thousand Cead Mille Failthes.

The August fair of Boyle was remarkably small and the prices demanded so high, that very few sales were effected. The high prices latterly obtained, have naturally led the grazier to expect a corresponding figure; but the fact that the government, finding they have in store at least three years provisions, and in order to make room for beef and pork daily arriving from the late scene of war, threw into the English market a large quantity of beef and pork (of last year's curing); the former, which cost £4, brought only £4 10s., and the latter, which cost £3, was disposed of at from 22s. to 18s. per cwt.

The Dublin Freeman reports that the rain and storm which, within the last three days, has followed a season unprecedented for many years in Ireland for intense heat, has come rather unexpectedly on farmers having crops to reap, as well as on shipowners having vessels at sea. The weather in the channel continues still very boisterous. The steamers Trafalgar and Duke of Cambridge had to put back, owing to the heavy weather. The mail boat for Holyhead could not leave the harbor until considerably after her time, owing to the tremendous severity of the gale then blowing. Considerable apprehensions were entertained for the safety of the vessels in the Channel.

Much dissatisfaction prevails amongst the Catholic body in Limerick, owing, the Tipperary Vindicator states, to the one-sided arrangements that have been made with regard to the new military cemetery in Limerick. It appears that the Protestant rector is to receive the burial fees both for Catholic as well as Protestant soldiers. The Vindicator recommends a burial place being set aside for soldiers at the new Catholic cemetery in that city.

An examination of gentlemen nominated for cadetships in the constabulary was held at Dublin Castle for three succeeding days. Out of sixteen candidates examined, Messrs. Peacock, Harvey, Hill, and Owen have been declared the successful competitors, and they have been appointed by the Lord Lieutenant to four existing vacancies in the force.

Sir E. M'Donnell, William Haughton, Esq., with Mr. W. R. Le Fanu and Mr. Miller, engineers; Mr. Croker Barrington, solicitor to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, and Mr. G. E. Ilberry, traffic manager, have inspected the contemplated line of railway from Roscrea to Nenagh. They are fully satisfied that the line could be economically constructed, and would be a good feeder for the Great Southern and Western Railway.

The Waterford News understands that Colonel Snow offered 4s 6d a day to a number of reapers, which they refused, and were subsequently offered 5s per day by a man of Mr. Kearney's, of Gracedieu, with whom they hired. A scarcity of women to bind corn, is very much felt.

An influential public meeting of the inhabitants of Drogheda has taken place in the Tholsel Court-house, for the purpose of causing two draw-bridges to be erected on the Boyne, without further delay, and thereby removing every obstruction to the free navigation of the river.

The Marquis of Waterford is going to erect a splendid and costly mansion at Curraghmore. This is cheering news, the Waterford papers say, for the stonecutters and mechanics of Waterford. Unlike other noblemen, Lord Waterford deserves great credit for staying amongst his own people, and spending his immense fortunes at home, instead of in Paris or London.

A correspondent of the Ulsterman says that the Drogheda linen trade is in a comparatively prosperous condition—all the operative weavers who wish to work, are steadily and constantly employed, and fresh orders, of an extensive kind are almost daily received by the principal manufacturers.

Twenty-seven emigrants, chiefly of the farming and artizan classes, have recently left Galway, for various parts of America. Most of them had been enabled to emigrate by the aid of remittances received from their friends in America.

M. Donovan, of Kinsale, whose literary productions have excited much admiration, has lately returned from Paris, where he has been prosecuting his studies for the ecclesiastical profession. The Cork Reporter understands that Mr. Donovan will leave Ireland again for the Continent about the commencement of October.

The Sisters of the "Good Shepherd" Convent, Limerick, gratefully acknowledge the receipt of 7 guineas, from the Right Rev. Dr. Ryan, towards the Bazaar, and several fashionable contributions from the Ex-Queen of the French, the Duchess d'Aumale and the Prince de Joinville.

Sir Thomas Esmonde has been requested by the Committee to invite his Excellency, the Lord Lieutenant, to lay the first stone of the Wexford Heroes' Testimonial; and the Right Hon. Baronet will invite His Excellency and friends to stay at Johnstown Castle, during their visit to Wexford.

There are upwards of 700 men employed on the Dundalk and Enniskillen railway, beyond Newbliss, under the direction of the contractors, Messrs. M'Cormack and Company. The work is being executed with great vigor, and it is expected that the line will be completed sooner than the period stipulated in the contract.

The parliamentary voters' lists of the county of the city of Limerick are now made out, and they comprise 2490 rated occupiers, 229 freeholders, 157 freemen, 52 claimants, as rated occupiers, and 8 claimants as freeholders.

A nugget of gold weighing six ounces troy weight, has been found in a stream near Arklow, county Wicklow.

The "United Kingdom."—A cynic might find considerable amusement in such incidents as the following (which are of almost daily occurrence at all the chief seaports of Ireland), as illustrations of what we so often, and so absurdly, designate as the "United Kingdom:"—

"Deportation of Irish Paupers.—On the 16th instant, a poor woman named Nancy Ferguson, who was near her confinement, was sent to Belfast by the Stork steamer from Glasgow, by the parochial authorities. Captain McBride, with his customary care, took the woman to the Refreshment rooms in Gambier street, and got her a breakfast; after which she went to Holywood in quest of her relatives. A woman named Catherine Byrne, who has been residing more than four years in Port Glasgow, and had received a slight injury at her work, was sent over in consequence of her applying for relief; an individual named Parker, with singular munificence, bestowed upon her one shilling, to defray the expense of her journey to the county of Roscommon. Captain M'Bride had her sent by the Windsor steamer to Dublin, and gave her money to defray her expenses homeward."—Banner of Ulster.

Poor Nancy was "mere Irish' surplus, however; and we must not forget that she might have been similarly treated at home by an Irish landlord, had she been tenant at will.—Kilkenny Journal.

For the last three weeks the wheat crop in the county Clare has fallen at the hands of the reaper. Never has it been more to the wishes of the farmer. Scarcity of hands and exorbitant rates of wages were expected, but they did not occur. The highest wages were 4s., in a few places, for three or four days; 2s. a day and diet was the ordinary run of the market. Everything has turned out very fair, and little cause for grumbling. As a farmer said at Meelick, "The man that was not content this year with the harvest God has given the country, ought to be taken and shot." Around Gort, and the Connaught boundaries of Clare, a good deal of work yet remains to be got through. The hands were absent, and are now only beginning to return. Near Limerick, within the past few days, farmers have been looking for laborers to stack the corn, without success. It is easier, however, to meet with reapers than good hands at stacking corn. Barley is in every direction a good crop, and in some instances above an average. Oats, as anticipated from the beginning of the season, deficient in straw, which is thin and short. Hay is by no means so good as in other years. In a few scattered places it is very good, but the great bulk will be short.

Dr. Apjohn, author of a pleasant work upon Continental Spas, declares his competent opinion favorable to the celebrated Spawaters of Lisdoonvarna, county Limerick, as "energetic agents in combating many forms of disease." The proprietor of the property upon which these spas are situated proposes to let sites for suitable lodges or little villas, in which invalids could have comfortable accommodation when enjoying the benefits of the spas. Apart from the efficacy of the waters, the surrounding scenery, including the Cliffs of Moher, Galway Bay, the Arran Islands, with their ancient ecclesiastical and other monuments, and the wild, irregular, picturesque coast of the Atlantic, form a combination of attractive objects, among which the most indefatigable of tourists might delightedly linger, and which would afford many worthy subjects for the artist's pencil.

Mr. John B. Murphy, for many years superintendent and paymaster of the Great Southern and Western Railway, has been appointed Governor of the city of Cork prison. The corporation of Cork has been fortunate in securing the services of Mr. Murphy, whose long connection with the Great Southern and Western Railway, and previously with the metropolitan police, as one of its earliest and most efficient officers, will enable him to bring to the discharge of his new duties an amount of useful experience which few men of his age have acquired.

We learn from the Kilkenny Journal, that notwithstanding the changeable weather for some time past, harvest operations have been proceeding in a most satisfactory manner throughout the county. There are still some vague rumors concerning the potato disease, but nothing of a tangible character. A curious phenomenon in the potato itself has been developed in several farms in the vicinity of Kilkenny—a number of small tubers emerging out of each potato. Experienced agriculturists call it a second growth, occasioned by the recent rain succeeding a protracted drought.

Several improvements are about being made in Kilkenny. The town council are deliberating about them. Edmund Smithwick is determined to establish a fair green, which has long been sadly wanted. The mayor, in the same spirit, wants to widen Irishtown, and thus beautify that dull looking vicinity. And Dr. Cane is on the alert for the erection of a rustic footbridge from New-quay to the Lake, and the continuation of the roadway of St. John's quay to Green's bridge, gate-keepers to be appointed and placed in charge at either end.

At a meeting of the Joint Committee of the Grand Juries of the County and City of Waterford, for the purpose of deciding on the best route for a line of railway from Cappoquin, through Dungarvan and Waterford, it was determined, after hearing the statement of Mr. Tarrant, County Surveyor, and inspecting a number of plans and surveys prepared by that gentleman, that the line to be recommended should run into Waterford by the Bilberry rock. It was also determined to call a general county meeting, to be held at the Court-house, Dungarvan, where it is intended to recommend that the rate in aid of the guarantee shall fall equally on owners and occupiers, as in the case of the poor rate.

The Dundalk Democrat is glad to learn that Mr. J. C. Duffy has been collecting subscriptions in that town, in aid of the fund for the relief of the inhabitants of France, who have suffered from the inundations. He has been very successful. The Primate and clergy, assembled at a recent conference, set an admirable example to the people of Dundalk, having contributed £32 to the fund.

A brilliant lecture has been recently delivered before the Young Men's Society of Cork, by Mr. Kenny, of Mount Mellary Abbey. The subject was, "The Orators of Ireland." The address consisted chiefly of brief, but pithy and careful sketches of most of our great speakers, including Flood, Grattan, Curran, and O'Connell, with illustrative passages from their speeches, and glimpses of their times.

We learn from a parliamentary paper that the net produce of the Irish revenue for 1855 was £6,056,272, which was paid into the Exchequer. It was made up of £1,919,108 collected under the head of Customs; £2,308,125 of Excise; £441,300 Stamps; £1,049,808 property and income tax; £26,000 Post-Office; £300 small branches of the Hereditary Revenue; and £311,629 miscellaneous, including the repayment of advances.

The Tuam Herald, said to be the organ of Archbishop MacHale, says: "From several facts which have hitherto escaped discussion and comment, the Irish Catholic public are beginning to feel that a new era of ecclesiastical policy for this country is about to commence. Laymen are slow to interfere in such matters, except with great caution and with bated breath; but when organic changes are about being made in the regimen of such a nation as Ireland—so long and so devotedly attached to the Holy See and Catholicity—it would be wise in those who originate such changes to pause in the onset of their career. Great zeal there may be, but over-zeal very frequently overshoots the mark, and works irreparable mischief. The Irish are proverbially submissive and deferential to their ecclesiastical superiors; but they are sensitive on all points affecting traditional rights and usages, to a degree which those alone who know their Catholic and national instincts can duly understand and appreciate. Whether rightly or wrongly, a notion has of late been gaining ground, that too close a connection with Whiggery is taking place amongst some of the dignitaries of the Irish Church. This notion is giving rise to feelings of mistrust. These feelings have hitherto been manifested only in a negative manner. But if the policy of maintaining Whiggery at the expense of freedom of religion and the rights of the nation is persevered in, it is difficult to say to what disastrous results it may lead."

The funeral of the Catholic Bishop of Wexford, was solemn in the extreme. The coffin was placed upon a catafalque in the centre of the church of Enniscorthy, with a number of tapers lighted round it. The Archbishop of Dublin was the high priest on the occasion, and the Right Rev. Dr. Walsh, Bishop of Ossory, assisted at the ceremony. The clergy in attendance, including Monsignore Yore, numbered about one hundred Amongst the laity present, were John H. Talbot, Sir Jam Power, Sir Thos. Esmonde, John Edward Redmond, John Maher, John T. Devereux, M. P., T. R. Colelough, John Walsh, J. P., and Dr. O'Rourke. Immediately after the burial, there was a meeting of the chapter, when the Very Rev. Dean Murphy, of Glynn, was unanimously declared vicar-capitular.

From the Waterford News we learn that a valuable little book, under the title of "The Sporting Capabilities of Ireland," by a deputy-lieutenant of the county of Waterford, has just been published by Messrs. Hodges & Smith, Dublin. The object of the writer is to turn the attention of Irish country gentlemen to the preservation of game on their estates, and to show that it is protection from vermin more than food or soil which is essential to game. The notes refer principally to a plateau of ground on which the writer himself resides, situated in that part of the county of Waterford contained between the rivers Blackwater and Bride, near Cappoquin, and which contains about twelve thousand acres of land, the property of the Duke of Devonshire.

Distressing accounts still reach us of the sad effects produced by the destruction of the crops in the barony of Upper Fews, by the recent terrible hailstorm. The crops in five townlands in that barony have been left quite useless to the inhabitants, and two other townlands in the county Monaghan are in a similar condition. There are about seven hundred acres in the seven townlands, and estimating the value of the crops on an average at ten pounds per acre, seven thousand pounds' worth have been destroyed. The corn crops are of no value whatever, the very grass was beaten into the earth; mangle and turnips were stripped of their leaves, and their growth stopped, and as the potato stalks were cut in pieces, it is certain the half-grown tubers are worth little or nothing.

The interest at first excited by the unexpected discovery of the sulphur spa near Ennis has not in the least abated. Dr. Evans, of Newmarket-on-Fergus, visited it, and brought away in his gig a vessel filled with the water, for analytical scrutiny. Dr. Evans' opinion is, that in all respects it is as good as the sulphur spa of Lisdoonevarna, on the adjacent land, in possession of a man named Crowe. On the property of Lord Inchiquin, another spring indicating the presence of iron to the taste, has made its appearance. Mr. Hennessey, the owner of the sulphur spa, has sent a quantity of it to Dublin, with the necessary fee, and on receipt of the testimony of chemical investigation, he intends publishing the particulars for the public satisfaction.

As James Hodgkins, Michael Lanigan, and Michael Bourke were lately returning to their residence from Templemore, they were met by Thomas Cosker, Joseph Maher, Brian Gleeson, and Michael Fogarty, when an altercation between the parties took place, in which Hodgkins received two fractures on the head. Coskar and his party have absconded.

Some difficulty is pending between the Galway Board of Guardians and the Catholic chaplain of the Union. The case has been warmly taken up by the Board. The majority stand firmly by their officer. Captain Kirwan, a Protestant gentleman of intelligence and education, expressed the sense of the Board when he testified to the private and public worth of the Rev. Mr. Daly.

A splendid new steamer, the Montagu, has just been built in Liverpool for the Wexford steam packet company. She will carry 300 head fat cattle, and 1,500 pigs and sheep—has good cabins for 30 passengers, and a house on deck for 100 steerage ones. Her speed is expected to enable her to make the passage at all times under 16 hours.

The tobacco manufacturers of England have put on a further advance of 2d. per lb. on tobacco. The price of leaf tobacco in 1850, was 5d. It is now 10d. to 1s. The Limerick manufacturers are about to advance. Their trade has been ruinous for some years past.

The patron-feast of Kilmurry, one mile from Waterford, was attended by several hundred persons. The amount of drink consumed at it, was beyond all precedent.

Miss Palmer, Assistant Mistress of the Limerick Model School, is appointed by the Commissioners of National Education, head mistress of the infant model school, under the board, at Kilkenny.

The amount of subscriptions received for the public park, at Waterford, exclusive of £500 from Government, is about £950.

The grand jury of Wexford agreed to have a free bridge in Ross—an act of parliament was obtained for the purpose; but all fell to the ground because the grand jury of Kilkenny disagreed.

The late Bishop of Ferne, Dr. Murphy, was nephew to the celebrated Father Murphy, who commanded the insurgents in '98, and was killed at the battle of Gorey.

Ald. Forristal, Waterford, daily expects a cargo of hemp and tallow, the first imported direct from Russia into that part of Ireland since peace was established.

The Killarney Races commenced under the most favorable circumstances. The weather was bright and cheerful, the course admirably selected, stretching out at some distance from the lower lake, and the proceedings were conducted by the Stewards in a manner that showed the most anxious desire to gratify the public. An admirable view of the course was commanded from a capacious stand-house erected by Mr. William Connell, of Killarney; and an idea of the success of the meeting may be inferred from the fact that the receipts obtained for admission on the platform exceeded the money taken during the entire three days of the last races. The first race was for the Kenmare Stakes. The horses went out well together, and a close and well contested race ensued. Mr. Barry's Brother to Middleton took the lead, the Maid of Balmoral keeping well up, and Morgan Rattler taking the third place. They continued in this position for only a short time; Morgan Rattler quickly collared Mr. Barry's horse, and, in a very few strides after, passed out of the leading horse and won by about half a length. Walterstown was second, and the Maid of Balmoral a very good third, indeed between the third and winning horse the distance amounted to little more than a length. Kitty Free came in fourth, and the other horse was distanced. The next race was the Killarney Stakes. Mr. Courtney's b m Black Rose; Mr. Barry's Brother to Lord Midleton; Mr. Dillon's Maid of Balmoral. The first heat was very well contested in the commencement, and excited much interest. The Maid of Balmoral won by about two lengths, and had a walk over for the second heat. A hack race terminated the sports of the day, and afforded quite as much amusement as the more pretentious races that preceded it.

We have much pleasure in extracting the following tribute to the bravery and generous spirit of a young County Wexford man, Lieutenant William Crosbie Harvey, of the 9th Regiment of Foot, from the Kingston Daily News of the 22d of last month. On Friday fortnight, a party proceeded in boats to Kingstown Mills, to enjoy a pic-nic regalement. Dinner was prepared on the flat near the first lock of the Rideau Canal, the wild and rugged scenery on each side of which is familiar to most Kingstonians. After the conclusion of the repast, which was heightened by lively conversation, bon-mots, jocular repartee, and the usual agremens of a refined social party, the ground was cleared of all obstructions, and the band, giving forth its enlivening strains, the young and gay of both sexes resorted to the pleasurable exercise of "dancing on the green," which they did with a heartiness pleasant to behold. The graver portion of the party were divided into little knots, rambling about the locks and rocks which in that locality abound; and up on the craggy steeps, and on the railway bridge, the denizens of that sterile locality looked down from their lofty positions on the animating scene below. The tout ensemble presented a spectacle of uncommon attraction, and will not soon be forgotten by those who witnessed it. A waiter who had partaken rather freely of the generous beverages provided for the occasion, in passing by a "set" who were dancing near the lock, stepped near the edge of the lock, lost his balance, and went into the lock. The alarm was instantaneous; several gentlemen threw off their coats previous to jumping after him; others threw ropes and billets of wood for him to cling to, but Lieutenant Harvey, leaped into the water, seized hold of the man (who had already sunk twice), and held him up by almost superhuman strength, until both were rescued from their perilous situation.

Three orphans, Michael, Martin and Bartholomew Egan, were kidnapped on the 7th instant, conveyed to Clifden, and located in one of the proselyting schools. These facts were elicited in open court. The magistrates presiding were the Rev. H. Darcy, chairman; Lord French, Samuel Jones, Valentine O'Connor Blake, John Scully, and R. Shaw, R. M. The case was brought under notice by the Very Reverend P. McManus, P. P. of Clifden, and urged by Cole Rochford, of Galway. After many fierce encounters between some of their worships on the one side, and the learned attorney and parish priest on the other side, the reverend chairman was induced to engage to have the children brought from his proselytising establishment, and delivered up to their guardian aunt, Bridget Tolan.

A correspondent of the Telegraph calls attention to a decision pronounced in College street Police Office. Two men, assuming to be officers in the army (but who were stated to be servants, one of them to Lord Seaton, and the other to Sir Henry Marsh,) went to the north transept of the church of St. Andrew, in Westland-row, and continued for some time at the entrance chirping to the females, and throwing their arms around their shoulders, attempting to embrace them. This indecent conduct was accompanied by more indecent language. A police constable removed them, when they went to the front entrance, and repeated their misconduct. The constable again removing them, they attempted to maltreat him. They were fined 5s., or to be imprisoned for forty-eight hours. They paid the fine, and went away laughing, saying, "We had damned fine sport for 5s."

The Banner of Ulster reports of the Linen Trade that sales of goods for the home market have been steady, but not so active as could be anticipated. Coarse fabrics sell as fast as they can be got ready for the warehouse. Medium goods have been worked off pretty largely; still the stocks in hand range high. Prime linens may be set down as under the usual average, both in the hands of bleachers and manufacturers. Prices are firm for every description of fabrics, and especially for the finer class of goods. Damasks have been moved in large quantities. The very fine department of the trade has held a position all season. Demand for the United Service has been very active with those houses which hold orders from the army and navy. Yarns are firm. The thread trade continues brisk in all its branches, and at present the largest manufacturers find it difficult to meet orders.

The Intended Brigades in Ireland.—Dublin Brigade, Cavalry, 2nd and 3rd Dragoon Guards, 8th Hussars, and 17th Lancers. 1st Infantry Brigade, 2nd Battalion Grenadier Guards, 4th and 33d Regiments. 2nd Brigade, 50th, 77th, and 95th Regiments. Royal Artillery, one troop of the Horse Brigade and two Field Batteries. Cork, 56th and 99th Regiments. Birr, the depots of the 18th, 63d, 65th, 67th, and 76th Regiments. Belfast—The depots of the 3d, 46th, and 68th Regiments. Limerick, the depots of the 9th, 17th, and 39th Regiments.

Henry Grattan and family have arrived at Vicarstown Cottage in the Queen's County, where his tenants welcomed their arrival by a bonfire on a most extensive scale. A piper and two fiddlers being in attendance, dancing commenced, in which Mr. Grattan and the Misses Grattan joined. The village of Vicarstown, was illuminated. Porter, ale, and other refreshments were freely furnished to the revelers.

J. Murray at the gate of Clonmel—Dean Burke and Alderman Hackett—Don Quixotte and Sancho Panza—Donnybrook Fair—Catherine Hayes—Louis Blanc's letter—Louis Napoleon—God save the Emperor.

We have had two great events here lately. There was the presentation of colors to the 18th Royal Irish, and there was the installation of the Marquis of Londonderry as Knight of the Order of St. Patrick. Both were mighty fine in their way. The former took place in the Phœnix—everything takes place there. A large square was formed by several detachments of cavalry and foot regiments. Inspector Walpole, with a body of Dublin Blues, assisted the military in holding their ground. That is, they stood behind and propped them up with their batons. The Blues are a glorious body. But, strange to say, if any one else gets "glorious" they're sure to fine or degrade him.

The civilians, of course, were out in thousands. The Squares, and such genteel subdued streets as Fitzwilliam and Harcourt, sent out their carriages, their faded liveries, and bouquets of beauty—the latter done up in the handsomest style. Great Britain street, and the humbler regions of gentility in the neighborhood of the Reservoir, St. Anne's church, and the Royal canal, contributed their inhabitants on out-side-cars. Dublin, in fact, on wheels or on foot, was out on the day in its beautiful park. 'Twould have been a fine day for housebreakers. But even housebreakers have turned loyal just now, and wouldn't for the world follow their trade on such an occasion.

In the centre of the square the 18th was drawn up, in companies formed in columns. Nearly all the men wore their Crimean beards and medals. Their appearance was splendid. None but Irish soldiers could show such limbs and faces. Their muscle was not a whit more striking than their intelligent look. But there they were, with all their finery about them, and years and years of glory blending in the rich sunshine above their lifted bayonets, and all eyes upon them—there they stood, the pillars of an empire, within whose walls their own country, once so bright and promising, has been entombed. By all that's lovely! I could write with infinitely greater heart were I writing to you from behind one of the huge idols of Yucatan, in the midst of lizards the length of a shark, than I can do now, sitting within sight of the Wellington Testimonial and within hearing of the bells of Christ Church.

The Lord Lieutenant, who did the honors of the occasion, wore the uniform of a Lieutenant-General, and the collar of the Order of St. Patrick—not the collar of gold which Malachi wore. A brilliant staff accompanied his Excellency. A squadron of the Queen's Bays served as the vice-regal escort. All the delightful flesh and blood of the Castle—all the dimples, smiles, snowy teeth, swan-like necks, and coral lips which through that dingy higgledy-piggledy building spread light, and mirth, and love, and fragrance, and the sweetest nonsense—all that Sir Peter Lily, or Daniel Maclise himself could paint, was there. In other words, old Lady Dover was there, and so was Lady Fanny Howard, and so was Mrs. Shaw. Who the deuce is Mrs. Shaw? But the Freeman's Journal, Saunders (nothing at all to your friend the ex-Consul) the Post, and the rest of them actually riot in all the luxurious extravagances Johnson's dictionary or Rambler can supply, describing the splendors of the day.

Far away, however, next to the Irish regiment itself, the finest and most attractive feature on the crowded field, was old Lord Gough. In full uniform, with several pounds' weight in silver and gold medals on his breast, he rode about the lines, and was tremendously cheered. Rebel as I am, I cheered him myself. Under whatever flag he serves, I can't help feeling an interest in the Irish soldier—feeling sorrow for him if he fails or falls—feeling proud of him when he wins the spurs.

The Lord Lieutenant in delivering the new colors to the Regiment, delivered a speech, a correct copy of which I send you. It is really eloquent. With a few alterations, no better speech could be delivered by the President of an Irish Republic on a similar occasion. The old colors were quietly deposited the next day in St. Patrick's Cathedral. The officers of the 18th dined with his Excellency in the evening at the Vice-regal Lodge. The Repeal of the Union was one of the toasts.

Not having been present when the cloth was removed (nor before it, indeed, for the matter of that) I cannot personally vouch for the truth of the last little sentence. Nor was I present at the installation of the Marquis of Londonderry. The Dublin papers (all of them) contain interesting accounts of the ceremony, and give equally interesting historical accounts of the Knights of St. Patrick. By-the-bye, wouldn't that be a capital name for a convivial club of Irishmen in America? A club which would include men of all creeds and political opinion, and be shut against none who had the heart, the proprieties, and culture of a gentleman. There's a sprig of shamrock for you! Let's see what you'll make of it.

Mr. Patrick Joseph Murray went down the other day, accompanied by his solicitor, Mr. P. J. McKenna, to Clonmel, and hammered away with an odd volume of the Irish Quarterly Review at the gate. Old Dean Burke was behind the door, and let him in. There was a bonfire in honor of Mr. Murray, and a "good string band"—so the correspondent of the Limerick Observer writes—and "the greatest enthusiasm."

Dean Burke, no doubt, holds the key of Clonmel in his pocket, and whoever is his favorite is sure to get in, whether it be to the Poor-house or Parliament that admission is sought. Alderman Hackett, proprietor of the Tipperary Free Press enthusiastically supports Murray. The Alderman and the Dean always pull together. They're a picturesque couple—heavy waists, short legs, aerial heads. If the Dean were four feet taller, (he might be that, and still be nothing very much out of the way in height,) and were he a little cadaverous, instead of being so corpulent and mellow, I might liken his reverence to Quixotte, and Hackett to Panza. In one respect, at-all-events, the comparison would hold. The knight and his squire were inseparable. The same can be said of the Dean and the Alderman. They are the Siamese twins of Clonmel—the same brains, the same girth, the same beautiful features in all respects. May they live a thousand years, and go to Heaven together!

Mr. Murray's opponent is Mr. Barton, who professes what is called the Conservative creed. My good wishes attend Mr. Barton. Not surely that I am a Conservative, but that I wish to see Irish gentlemen of high social rank in Parliament instead of adventurers and upstarts. In the latter category I locate the protegé of Dean Burke.

But, after all, what a waste of time, and type, and paper it is, writing about such obscure personages and such tame events? Depend upon it, neither should have as much as a monosyllable from me, were there anything of the slightest interest doing in Mr. Porter's police-office, or any other place of amusement. There's Donnybrook fair, to be sure, but that's as dry as an old wig now. The shine has been taken out of it completely. The beautiful glossy curls it had once, are as flat as a pan-cake to-day. It's only military displays, reviews in the Park, presentations of colors, and Proclamations of Peace—we attend to now. We have grown to be a sensible, respectable, loyal people. From sunrise to the going down thereof, we look up at Nelson's Pillar, and thank God for the victories of England. We go round on our converted knees (they were once as bold and inflexible as brass,) and make our devout pilgrimage to the black images of the Georges, inside the wall of the Mansion House, and the palisades of Stephen's Green; and after that we kiss the petrified tail of Willam's horse, in College Green, and on a Sunday we walk out along Blackrock road (it's as dusty as ever) with boiled peas in our brogans, to Kingstown, and there, on our marrow-bones, we repeat the oath of allegiance to the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, holding on by the granite legs of George the Fourth. Heighho! As the London Times recently said (speaking of Ireland,) "it's now all pigs, poultry, potatoes and flax."

It's pleasanter to turn to the brilliant successes of Catherine Hayes, who has been carrying the green flag of Ireland—like Moore's heroine bearing the wand of the "bright gold ring" all through the "sainted isle of old"—and who has lately come among us once more. The Cork Examiner says that—

"The artistic voyage round the world of this artiste is the most extraordinary one ever undertaken by any singer. Miss Hayes left Liverpool for New York in the Pacific, in 1851. After a tour in the United States she arrived in San Francisco, in November, 1852. At the close of a brilliant career in California, Miss Hayes departed for South America. After visiting the principal cities, she embarked for the golden cities of the great Australian ocean. She gave concerts in the Sandwich Islands, and arrived in Sydney in January, 1854. From Sydney Miss Hayes went to Melbourne and Adelaide, and from the last mentioned place to India, giving concerts in Calcutta and Singapore, one of which was in aid of the Patriotic Fund. From Singapore Miss Hayes traveled to Batavia, and in the capital of Java the "Swan of Erin" created an immense sensation. From Batavia, Port Philip Bay was the next locality. After revisiting Melbourne and Sydney, Miss Hayes paid a visit to the Bendigo gold field, where she gave four concerts. Tasmania was the next voyage, singing in Hobart Town and Launceston, the chief cities. From Melbourne Miss Hayes embarked for Liverpool, where she arrived, a fortnight since, after an absence of five years."

From music to murder is a jump. But as I've just come in from Donnybrook, and as my legs are light (though there was nothing to do in the dancing way there) I can easily manage the transition. You've read Louis Blanc's letter to the Times, showing up the atrocities perpetrated on the Frenchexiles in Cayenne, and the deadly tortures they have had to endure there? Commenting on this letter, and the reception it has met in England, the Nation gives us the following—

The English people have for some time past been overflowing with sympathy for political prisoners, and uttering dark threats against small despots. If that sympathy and those threats are not the meanest things under Heaven, let us see them now employed in behalf of the French prisoners who pine and rot in Cayenne, who bend under heavy chains, and perish from bad food and insufficient clothing. The English press have recommended that ships of war should visit the Bay of Naples and show their teeth to "King Bomba." The exhibition, it was believed, would frighten him into good manners, if not into eternity, and cause him to open as fast as he could, with quaking fingers; all the prison doors in his dominions. Will any of these brazen organs now recommend a visit to Cherbourg or Toulon, and hope to terrify Louis Napoleon? His prisons are many in France, and beyond the sea—they are well filled, and so securely barred and bolted that rarely even a groan escapes. Will there be a flourish of arms in favor of the victims. No; for his Imperial Majesty is "Our august ally," and he has a fine fleet and a tremendous army at his command. There may be some gentle murmurs and easy whispers on the subject, not loud enough to wake the baby; but there will be no talk of sending ships to French harbors, and no incitements to the mob of Paris to rise in insurrection.

Instead of a flourish of arms in favor of the victims, there's a flourish of a forest of goose-quills from one end of England to the other in deprecation of what the worthy liars of London insist must be a tissue of falsehoods. No, it couldn't be that this magnanimous Prince, Napoleon by the Grace of God, would permit such things to pass! It couldn't be that his great heart, which ever recoils from perfidiousness and cruelty would abandon to the mercies of a ruthless climate and a yet more ruthless police the Republicans of France, vengeful and contumacious as they are!

> "O Father Abraham, what these Christians are,
> Whose own hard dealing teaches them suspect
> The thoughts of others?"

The Paris correspondent of the Times comes out with a pretty long defence and exculpation of the French authorities, denying, in fact, the statement of the thirty-four prisoners at Cayenne, upon which Louis Blanc founded his letter, and going so far as to stigmatize the sufferers in question as galley-slaves of the most debauched description. To this attack Louis Blanc replies—

"Is it conceivable that 34 men, living at the mercy of their enemies, in a place so far distant, with no prospect of material assistance, should be mad enough to sign a letter falsely stating as practised upon them such cruelties as these—the chains with a cannon-ball attached, the floggings at the stake, the blows and brutal outrages? When your correspondent asserts that three of the persons mentioned are liberated galley-slaves, and four of them repris de justice, he happens to confirm, in the most striking manner, one of the facts that have been denounced—namely, that in French Guiana, the political prisoners live side by side with ordinary prisoners."

Precisely what the gentle government of England did in your case—that is, classify you with burglars and murderers. No wonder they'd warmly defend in others the conduct they had the indecency and vulgar spite to be guilty of themselves. However, on this subject I have, perhaps, said quite enough. Perhaps a little too much. For I am well aware of the cat-like spittings, and snake-like hissings, and mangy mad-dog fury which assailed you shortly after your arrival in America, and for months and months subsequently, because, forsooth, you saw blood on the hands of Napoleon, the Usurper, and refused to say they were white. And all this in consequence of his having the devilish hypocrisy to be "a practical Catholic"—that is to go sedulously and ostentatiously through all the exterior forms of our ancient noble faith and worship— and assume to be the Champion of the Church!

Let us cease—down growler! The great Cæsar passes through his superb camp, which on the map of Europe is called France, and no one curses him but some forcat, rotting, with a cannon-ball chained to his ulcerous leg, in the Isle du Diable.

KILMAINHAM.

WATERFORD LETTER.

A shaky Correspondent—Barrack-aid supporters—why they want a Barrack—Major Talbot, a white beaver in search of a Coronet—Moveable Peer and a stationary Baronet—Sir Henry W. Barron at Mass—Ballybricken at Cheltenham—the Clergy no joke—Father Cantwell and the new Church at Tramore, &c.

WATERFORD, August 30.

It's an age since I wrote to you. I've been very sick, and the scorching hot weather we had these weeks back didn't help me to get better. My illness caused me a good deal of annoyance. The severest trouble I had arose from the fact of my not being able to drop you a line. Feeling considerably stronger to-day, and not wishing to nurse my weakness much longer, I dip the pen in the inkstand, and send you a column of gossip. The pen, not having been used these two months, is stiff, black, and clotted. It's more like a rusty skewer than a pen. There's a thin pale-green blanket spread all over the inkstand inside, and the ink itself is as thick and curdy as butter-milk. My head is slightly dizzy, too, and my poor hand is shaking.

Such being the circumstances under which I write, I wouldn't be in the least degree astonished, and certainly wouldn't be in the least displeased—not the least—to find my scrawl upon foolscap amongst the "rejected addresses" one of these days. Fortune, however, favors the brave, and that there's nothing like audacity I have Danton's, and I believe Lord Bacon's authority for saying.

Just at present, there's a good deal of earnest talk and agitation about the new barracks. Our fellow-citizens are anxious to have Waterford a military head-quarters again. The old barracks have long since been found much too confined for more than four or five companies of infantry. The Corporation have offered the Government a building-site. There have been deputations to Lord Panmure, Secretary of War, on the subject. Lord Stuart de Decies is strongly in favor of the project. So is the Marquis of Waterford. And, strange to say, so is your father and the Bishop of Cashel. Strange to say! For both of them are strenuous advocates of peace. Your father is, at-all-events; and the Bishop should be, at least by profession. The one, however, is Member for the city, and must see to its interests. The other is a staunch, bluff old Tory, and as a Tory has a firm faith in bayonets, and desires to see them multiplied. The Waterford News of the 22nd has an article setting forth the advantages to the Government, in a military point of view, in the selection of Waterford for the new barracks. For you must know, Clonmel has been contending for the honor. Carrick, too, had some notion that Carrick was the spot. And I wouldn't be a bit surprised if Piltown considered that the claims and pretensions of Piltown were superior to both. The News says—

"Waterford is a starting point from which troops can be easily drafted by railway or boat to Kilkenny, Carlow, Dublin, &c., in one direction; Clonmel, Cahir, Limerick, or Cork, in another; and in a short period, through the centre of the county, by rail. To the town and county of Wexford, troops can be drafted hence by steamboat. From no point in the South of Ireland, but Waterford, can troops diverge into so many localities situated in the heart of the country. Then the great facility of embarking and disembarking troops in this port, either by her Majesty's or local steamers, is a consideration which, we are sure, no government can lend a deaf ear to."

In case Waterford be decided on, 2,000 men will be in garrison here. Fancy that! Just think of that! And as you sit there in your "dim corner of Ann and Nassau," mount Queen Mab's "pearly and pellucid car," and like Ianthe's soul that

> "Saw not the yellow moon,
> Saw not the mortal scene,
> Heard not the night-wind's rush,
> Heard not an earthly sound—" whip over the clouds of time as well as those of land and sea, and through the azure openings which crevice both, look down upon the populous, proud, gay Waterford there will be standing here upon its old Danish basement, four or five years to come!

An old friend of yours—he's a decidedly "old friend," if one may infer so from his wig and his wrinkles—is understood to have very strong claims to the title and estates of the late Earl of Shrewsbury, and purposes to vindicate them. A jovial, comical, brave old fellow is Major William Talbot, of Castle Talbot, and I sincerely pray that he may one of these days exchange his dusty old white beaver hat for the triple coronet of Shrewsbury, Waterford and Wexford, and that he may pour his soul into his German and play Away with Melancholy, for the rest of his days, on a purple velvet cushion, in the luxurious mellow light of Alton Towers.

But even with that prayer, I'm not yet done with the Peerage.

The Marquis of Waterford purposes erecting a splendid new mansion at Curraghmore, and Sir Henry Winston Barron has returned to Barrons-court. He is looking well—as well as he can. Among the news items of our Waterford papers, I find it stated that the excellent Baronet "attended Mass at the Catholic Cathedral on Sunday last, and other days during the week." Young Lord Carew and his family have arrived at Woodstown. In a day or two I promise myself the pleasure of driving out there—I mean to Woodstown strand—for I haven't the honor of being on speaking terms with his accomplished and exemplary young lordship. If all noblemen were like him, republican as I am, I'd hardly feel disposed to melt down the glittering baubles of aristocracy into hard cash for the commonwealth. But, good and courteous and accomplished as young Lord Carew is, I'd like to see him with a bigger heart. He's not genial, racy, bounteous enough in his nature.

Father Martin Flynn, of Ballybricken, has for the season exchanged the salubrious breezes of Bilberry Rock for the aperient springs of Cheltenham. He sailed the other day in the Malakoff steamer. How mournfully he must miss poor Father John Sheehan on the trip across, and the promenades morning and evening, at the Montpelier Spa. For years, you remember, Father John and Father Martin visited that fashionable summer-resort of the constipated nobility and gentry together. It was not so much, I believe, to renovate their health as to extend their acquaintance, and brush off some of the dust of St. Patrick's, and get rid of the smell of the turf and sea-weed of Passage, the good-hearted, respectable priests used to go so far from home. But they never altered a whit. Their native good-nature and grace went, remained, and came back (if that's not a blunder) just as it went. Their hearty mellow Irishism couldn't be kept under, nor washed out with spa-water, nor fanned into thin air by all the visiting-cards and invitation-notes from Bath to Harrowgate. Having a sound root in their hearts, it thrived exuberantly, and was ever in blossom. Once, I understand, it broke out through Father John's carpet-bag. The Hon. Mr. Hastings, Lord Huntingdon's brother, used to mention a catastrophe which once befel the reverend gentlemen on the quay of Bristol. But I don't like letting the cat out of the bag, and accordingly draw in the strings. Were I to slacken them further, they might accuse me of lampooning the priesthood. Some people are so pious, or ignorant, they never tolerate a joke where a priest is in question—as if a priest hasn't his foibles as well as any other good man. What a world it would be, were it peopled only by hypocrites and fools! As it is, it's better to be reserved in our jokes—better not rush in where angels fear to tread.

You've heard, of course, that a new Catholic church is in contemplation for Tramore. The old one (just opposite the Wren's Nest, you remember) doesn't at all answer the requirements of the congregation, nor is it, in an architectural point of view, very creditable to the beautiful little town of Tramore. Father Nicholas Cantwell has commenced the work with an energy and zeal which few but himself can manifest. The Catholics of his parish, and those of Waterford and Kilkenny, have seconded, and continue to second, his efforts with the most generous alacrity. The subscription list already promises bountifully well for the splendid success of the work. A few days ago, we had an amateur concert in the Town Hall in aid of the funds. The vast room was crowded to excess. Among the ladies and gentlemen who volunteered their services for the occasion, was John F. Dunford, whose fine voice has lost none of its power since the days you used to write love-songs for the Philharmonic Society, and Dunford used to sing them.

As for Father Cantwell himself, they tell me he's in glorious good health, and, spite of his weight of years and cares, still, in his erect tall frame and sweet bright kindly features, bears out what O'Connell proudly said of him—that he was "the handsomest priest in all Ireland."

I pray sincerely and fervently, that Heaven will spare him long to see this noble pile he desires to crown with the Cross of Truth, calling from its belfry—calling from the fields, and the cliffs, and their boats and fishing-nets—as the Divine voice did once on the shore of Galilee—the thousands who for years have known him as their father.

THE CONNAUGHT RANGERS—ONE OF THEIR ENSIGNS.

From the Waterford Mail.

It has always given us pleasure to be enabled to do justice to the bravery of any of our countrymen who may have distinguished themselves during the late war, and we are glad, therefore, that a correspondent has called our attention to the case of Mr. Patrick Dwyer, an ensign in the 88th regiment, who rendered himself conspicuous on more than one occasion in the Crimea, but whose name, like those of many others not less brave, has hitherto been overlooked. This young officer, a native of the Queen's County, enlisted in the glorious Connaught Rangers in the year 1850, being then only 18 years of age. He accompanied his regiment to the East, and served with it during the whole period of the war, distinguishing himself by his good conduct, intelligence and courage. At the battle of Inkermann he behaved with great gallantry, and at the assault in the Quarries, on the 7th June, he was severely wounded. In this sharp and brilliant affair, the 88th lost no less than three captains and one lieutenant. One of these we may remind our readers, was a brave young Irishman whoso loss has been deeply felt by all who knew his manly and genial character. We refer to poor Captain Wray, to whom our correspondent Justitia made so touching an allusion in his first letter. After the affair of the Quarries, Patrick Dwyer received the well-merited reward of his services, being promoted to the rank of ensign in the gallant corps in which he commenced his military career.

THE IRISH PEOPLE AND THEIR PRIESTS.

From the Irish Annual Miscellany.

The temporal authority of the Priesthood over the people in Ireland sprang as naturally from the state in which the people existed, as does the authority of the parent over his children. The people were on all sides degraded, oppressed and plundered; degraded in the name they bore, in the language they spoke; degraded by the written law—degraded by the unwritten law of social usages. The Protestant yeoman trampled on them—the Protestant aristocracy trampled on them—not a few of the Catholic aristocracy trampled on them, or despised them, or neglected them or betrayed them. Alien priests of an alien creed trampled on them. Whatever contributes to form the character to self-reliance, to national independence—whatever contributes to educate the mind, to educate the heart, to civilize the manners, to invigorate the frame, were, as far as possible, taken from them. They were shut out from hope, and environed in affliction, as their island was environed by the sea. Ruled with a rod of iron, scourged with scorpions, pillaged with impunity, and slandered and murdered, a broken and dispersed people—sadness and abasement, and desolation impressed themselves in their hearts, and marked the race. Humiliation and woe became the characteristics of everything about them—of their music, their poetry, their dress, their dwellings, their gait, their demeanor, their sentiments, the very nature of their bodies, the very form and expression of their faces. Dark were memories and stories of the past, dark the picture of the present, dark the prospects of the future. It was no more the green Erin of the valleys and the streams, but Erin of the afflicted children for ever. Yet in that black sky there was one star ever bright—in that sea of bitterness there was one islet of comfort the waters could not cover. In their own priesthood was their common centre and their only centre of hope and consolation. There lay all their wisdom, all their guidance, all their reliance, all their strength to bear their chains, and all their strength to break them; and these were indeed all theirs. Theirs under the sword, under the cavern roof, under the forest tree—theirs through good report and evil report, in sickness and in health, in life and in death.

Never on this earth did kingly power so spring up from the very heart and soul of the people it ruled, flesh of its flesh and bone of its bone—of it and over it, as the head is in the human frame. Of the chieftains who rose from time to time to govern them, some died on the battle-field, some on the scaffold, some were bribed by gold to desert the nation's cause, some to desert the national faith—the succession was interrupted or lost, and the people were left without leaders having a claim on their confidence or obedience. But the apostolical succession of the priesthood remained unbroken throughout. It was not princely descent, nor Milesian blood, nor the position of broad lands, nor might in arms, nor skill in field or cabinet that aggregated men into this loyal line—not the will of flesh nor the will of man, nor the power of them, but the mysterious sacrament of God bequeathed to the church's keeping, the unwearied energy of the Catholic spirit, fed from above, believing all things, defying all things, daring all things. The races of kings and chiefs and bards, and whatever else might have, from old traditional feelings and customs, an acknowledged power to lead, disappeared in the lapse of dark and troubled ages, as rivers are lost in the sands of the desert. All that the people could reverence, or trust in, or follow, or rally round, was exterminated or bought over and ceased to be. The priesthood alone was left, still true to the people, with the same old faith, the same old religious ceremonies, and sacraments, and feelings and moral teaching. What was holiest and dearest in their past memories was preserved, and on this their affections and their reliance were concentrated with all the odor that had been divided over many. Time, death, shining gold, sharp steel, the gates of hell warred against every other rock of strength, and at last prevailed—warred against this rock and prevailed not. Community of country, of blood, of religion, of caste, of danger, of things hated and of things loved; of things to fly from and things to pursue—every claim to confidence which the true Christian possesses from a devoted Christian people, every claim to guidance, counsel, fidelity unto death, which such a people possess from such a priest—every principle of mutual sympathy and closest union without a single element of repulsion, all combined together in producing and consolidating this clerical power, the object of so much reverence—of so much vain fear, of so much angry vituperation. To the people it has not been a despotism to oppress and to be got rid of, but their pillar of light and consolation, their last tower of strength which the hand of heaven and their own built together, whose ruin would have been their greatest ruin.

POLITICS AND RELIGION.

From the Daily Orleanian.

Were T. F. Meagher a sectarian, and imbued with religious prejudices; or a bigot, who regarded all other creeds but his own ancient one, as dubious shoots and rotten branches, lopped from the great paternal tree which overshadows all regions of the earth, and flourishes alike in temperate and torid and frigid zone, we would give little heed to his teachings, and be careful of "pinning our faith" to his doctrinal opinions; but knowing that he is free from the paltry-minded, and grovelling, and narrow-souled weaknesses of the day, as regards church-dogmas and choice of creeds; and that intolerance he heartily dislikes, as he publicly and privately despises it, we at once adopt his views, and desire for them the currency which genuine coinage from a recognized and acknowledged mint, should ever receive.

The last number of Meagher's Irish News contains an article, in which the triune blendings of excellence, discrimination and eloquence are perceptible, and impress themselves at once on the reader's mind. It is captioned "Religion and Politics—Liberty of Conscience," etc., and shows that the pitiful and puerile folly of disliking persons because of their tenets and the temples they worship in, is an unaccountable, yet a miserable fact in the United States, where "no one system of religion, equipped and endorsed by the state, enlists and supports a standing army of bigots, to harass and subdue dissent;" whilst, most strange is the selection made, of an object of aversion in Catholicity—Catholicity which dates back to so distant a period, and is not of mushroom growth, or of to-day or yesterday's paternity; but is buttressed by centuries of years, and has stood the buffetings and the test of nearly fifteen hundred of them.

Singular indeed is the animosity manifested, and silly the vituperation on a religion of which in all ages, the most talented and enlightened of men have been professors, or as the News has it, "a creed and form which the greatest, the most intelligent and civilized nations of this earth to-day venerate and adhere to." Any man of ordinary common sense, it says, must treat with pity or contempt that vain and ignorant prejudice that would place a ban upon all persons who believe and worship in such a faith. But all other forms are accounted orthodox here. "A man may be a methodist, unitarian, quaker, shaker, mormon, infidel, without incurring censure or insult—nay, he may build a temple to Buddah, or set about burning the body of his wife, as a part of his religious system, and society looks on with mere curiosity, or mildly rebukes the unusual exhibition."

KNIGHTS OF ST. PATRICK.

From the Dublin Freeman.

At a recent chapter of the Order of St. Patrick, held at Dublin Castle by the Grand Master, the Lord Lieutenant, the Marquis of Londonderry was invested as one of the knights. The ceremony took place in the Throne-room. According to the statutes, the ordinary members of the order must be Irish peers, and the number is limited to twenty-two.

The order was founded in the year 1783, by George the Third, and dates from the feast of St. Patrick in that year. It owes its origin to the events of the preceding year, memorable in Irish history. The Volunteers were in arms, Irish Independence was declared and acknowledged, the Americans had thrown off the yoke of Great Britain, and it was then deemed advisable by various means to conciliate Ireland, and, amongst the means adopted, was the institution of this Order. The first Grand Master was Earle Temple, then Viceroy, and the members at that time created, comprised the patriotic Earl of Charlemont. The first installation banquet was one of extraordinary splendor; and, such was the interest it excited, that engravings of the banquet hall were published, and are sometimes to be met with. The late Duke of Kent and the father of the present Duke of Leinster were members.

At the first installation, in 1783, fourteen peers were installed. The second took place in 1800, when the Marquis Cornwallis was Grand Master. The third was in 1809, under the presidency of the Duke of Richmond. The fourth installation, in 1819, was conducted with great pomp and splendor. The knights went in procession on foot from Dublin Castle to St. Patrick's Cathedral, passing through Dame street, George's street, Aungier street, Bishop street, Kevin street, and through the grounds of the police barrack, Marsh's Library, and of the deanery, into the cathedral, which were opened through. The streets were sanded for the occasion and lined with troops, and near the cathedral crimson cloth was laid. The Earl Talbot, Lord Lieutenant, as Grand Master, was in the procession, and his robes, as well as those of the knights' companions, were held up by pages. The last installation was in 1821, under the presidency of George the Fourth. The only one of the peers present on that occasion, and who survives, is the Earl of Roden, and at the chapter held yesterday he wore the identical badge and ribbon with which he was invested by George the Fourth.

The throne-room was richly carpeted. The space within which the Knights sat near to the throne, was protected by a line of red rope drawn across, and without this the great body of the company was assembled.

The attention of the company was a good deal engaged by the exceedingly handsome full uniform, of a light blue, worn by an officer in the Austrian service, Lord Taafle, Col. of the 11th regiment of Austrian Hussars. He is an Irish peer, and possesses large estates in Bohemia and other portions of the Austrian empire, under which his family have served for many years. The present is his second visit to Ireland.

The Lord Lieutenant and party arrived from the Viceregal Lodge, at a quarter past three o'clock. A troop of the Queen's Bays attended as escort. A guard of honor of the 4th Regiment of Infantry was drawn up before the state entrance, and as his Excellency drove in presented arms, and the colors were lowered. A detachment of the Guards, commanded by Capt. Stuart, was drawn up in the grand hall, keeping a passage, through which his Excellency and attendants proceeded. He wore a blue uniform, the blue ribbon and pendent badge of the Order of St. Patrick, and the Insignia of the Garter. The Ulster King appeared in the ancient mantle over it. The Dean of St. Patrick's was attired in the blue mantle of the Registrar, and the Usher of the Black Rod wore a blue mantle.

The Lord Lieutenant, preceded by Colonel Larcom bearing the sword of state, and attended by the officers already mentioned, entered the Throne Room and took his seat in the chair of the Grand Master, placed at the head of a table covered with crimson, and close under the throne. At either side were the stalls of the Knights. One of the most remarkable features of the proceedings was the appearance of the magnificent blue mantle of Lord Carlisle as grand master. The richness of the Irish-poplin of which it is made and the exquisite workmanship were the subject of general admiration. The beauty of this mantle was in itself a happy tribute to the good taste and official propriety of his Excellency, in not merely commanding, by a formal ordinance, but also by example on this occasion, the strict observance of one of the original statues of the order which enjoins that the knights and officers shall be robed in "silk or satin manufactured in Ireland." The way in which that has been observed down to the present has been by getting French satin made up in London tailoring establishments. The beautiful poplin of his Excellency's robe was manufactured by the eminent house of Atkinson & Co., College-green, and it was made up at Macdona's. No other member of the order has ever worn, or as yet does wear, a mantle of Irish manufacture. The Marquis of Londonderry has ordered the material for his at Atkinson & Co's. His Excellency's mantle and those of the other knights had each upon the left shoulder a star worked with the motto "Quis separabit" on a blue border, and the year "1783"—a badge of gold surmounted by a wreath of shamrock or trefoil, within which is the circle of blue containing the motto. This circle encloses the cross of St. Patrick, gules surmounted with a trefoil vert, each of its leaves charged with an imperial crown, or upon a field argent. All these are within rays in the form of a star of silver consisting of eight joints.

The Lord Lieutenant having taken his seat, the Ulster King of Arms asked him if it was his pleasure that a chapter of the order should be held. His Excellency replied in the affirmative, and directed that the knights should be summoned. The knights, who had assembled in the robing room, soon after entered the Throne-room, wearing their mantles, stars, and collars. They occupied their stalls to the right and left of the grand-master, to whom they made the usual reverence.

THE 18th—ROYAL IRISH REGIMENT.

ADDRESS OF THE EARL OF CARLISLE.

"Officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the Royal Irish Regiment—I believe that at almost the first moment of your arrival from foreign lands, your fine regiment had the honor of being inspected by our beloved Queen, and that she directed to be conveyed to you her gracious approval of your gallant services. It is only, of course, in the character of her representative that I have now the extreme honor of delivering these new colors to a body of men thus distinguished both by royal approbation, and still more by their own brave deeds. In addressing the regiment of the Royal Irish upon so interesting and happy an occasion—the first of the kind that has occurred in the ancient capital of Ireland since the close of the late memorable war—I almost feel that I might carry my view even beyond your own well-filled ranks, and include all your countrymen who, by the side of their intrepid brethren of England and Scotland, and of our brave allies, have maintained the honor of their Sovereign and their race alike, by their brilliant valor and their heroic endurance throughout every turn and period of the desperate struggle. The ridges and dales of the far Crimea, the deadly trench and bloody parapet, are all crowded with their thousand proofs that the historic courage of Ireland has exhibited no falling off in the very newest of her soldiers. Confining myself, however, on this occasion, as is my proper business, to your regiment alone, and to the services attested by those old colors now about to be replaced—and not, it must be acknowledged, before the necessity for doing so has become tolerably obvious to all who look upon those honored shreds—I find certainly quite a sufficient abundance of glorious and stirring recollections as to make a selection, within such limits as my time and my voice place at my disposal, no easy matter.

"In the earliest annals of this regiment, under the immediate eye and guidance of a hero King, it planted its colors on the breach of Namur; and accordingly those colors to this day bear the name of Namur, and quarter with the Lions of Nassau the Harp and Crown of your own native Ireland. From that date they followed a yet more consummate general—the great Duke of Marlborough—through all his campaigns and all his victories; at the sieges of Venloo, Liege, Menin, Lisle, and Tournay—over the battle fields of Blenheim, Ramillies, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. Perhaps I may record with less pleasure that your regiment crossed swords with our American kinsmen at Bunker's Hill; but there, as elsewhere, they nobly did their duty. I have alluded to their services under Marlborough; we have had in our own day a chieftain more illustrious than even Marlborough, but the duties of distant service prevented the Royal Irish Regiment from actually fighting under Wellington. I speak, however, almost within the shadow of the monument raised by his countrymen, on his own native soil, to that great warrior; I speak—more touching association still—in the presence of those whose hoary hairs still recall the bright careers of glory which they pursued—may I say learned—under that great commander; and I call upon that mute gray pillar—I call upon their time-worn and honored forms as my witnesses, that the Great Duke himself would have approved and sanctioned the ceremony of to-day.

But I have not even yet exhausted the trophies of the Royal Irish. I find them serving, for the most part under Irish Commanders, at Alexandria under Cradock, still in Egypt under Hutchinson, in China under Gough—that revered Irish veteran, now happily here to witness your array in peace as he swayed your energies in war. The Sphynx on your flag speaks for Egypt, the Dragon for China; further, your impetuous onset carried the formidable Pagoda of Martiban in the last Burmese war; and latest of all, the memorable day of the 18th of June saw you actually housed within Sebastopol—and the name of that great Russian stronghold, now just added to your victorious colors, closes, up to this day at least, the long list of your glories. These and such are the colors I may now deliver to your faithful keeping; your regiment has won these honorable emblems in every quarter of the globe. In addition to the duties of soldiers, you are now called upon to exhibit the virtues of citizens; and let me remind you that one of those is to live in brotherly union, and not to think hardly of each other, though you may worship your Common Father in different houses of prayer. I feel sure, however, that no such lesson is needed under your present excellent officers. Receive, then, your new colors, men of the Royal Irish, at my unworthy hands—and it can scarcely be unsuitable for me at such a moment to put up a fervent prayer to the God of Armies that they may still, as ever heretofore, be the rallying point of Victory during war, and float above you in blameless honor during peace."

IRISH ECCLESIASTICS—CATHOLIC CHURCH AND UNIVERSITY.

From the Paris correspondent of the London Times.

"An apostolic instrument, or brief, signed by Cardinal Antonelli, and countersigned by Cardinal Burnabo, was, as I have already informed you, transmitted to Ireland soon after the death of the late Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda, Cardinal Fransoni. This document invited all the Roman Catholic prelates possessing episcopal jurisdiction in Ireland, to meet synodically under the presidency of Archbishop Cullen; and, among other things, it directed special attention—1, to the Irish Catholic University; 2, to the National system of education in Ireland; 3, to the College of Maynooth; and 4, to the Irish College in Paris.

"The synodical form of deliberation was prescribed in order to put an end to certain inconveniences which Dr. Cullen had noticed in the former annual meeting of the Irish episcopacy. It has also other advantages—for it obliges all the prelates who deliberate, to affix their names to the decisions of the majority; and what is still more important, it prescribes that these decisions shall be submitted to the supervision and correction of the Holy See. If any prelate dissents from any decision, he is at liberty to transmit such dissent to Rome.

"Three archbishops, twenty-two bishops, a vicar capitular, and a procurator of a fourth archbishop, promptly responded to the Apostolic summons. On the 20th of June these prelates commenced their session in Dublin, and they closed them on the 30th. The documents forwarded to the Holy See bear unquestionable testimony to the mature reflection and painstaking solicitude of the prelates, as well as their filial obedience and devotedness to the Holy See.

"The importance of the Catholic University for the education of the most interesting portion of the Irish Catholics, viz: the professional and the higher and middle classes, cannot be overrated. The success of that establishment is, therefore, a primary object of the solicitude of the Holy See; and the Propaganda and the Apostolic delegate are most anxious to secure for it adequate funds and an adequate attendance of pupils, and also to give to it the preeminence and authority due to such an institution. The power which a secular authority, not famed for its partiality to Roman Catholic doctrines or practices, possesses over the National schools in Ireland, and so over the education of a Catholic people, has been ever regarded here with jealousy and suspicion. These have been latterly awakened by reports of undue interference with practices common as well as sacred to all Catholics from their infancy—of indirect efforts to exclude nuns from the direction of schools, and of certain pretensions of the Board of Education. You are already aware of the anxiety of the Propaganda and of Dr. Cullen to remove from Maynooth and the College des Irlandais, what he considers to be certain secular infiltrations which, however valuable in political communities, are totally misplaced in establishments for the education of the clergy.

"It was proposed to the Synod to give to the University the inspection and supervision of all the Catholic educational establishments throughout the provinces. The very reverend and learned rector, Dr. Newman, presented a report, in which he stated that the very moderate sum of £5000 per annum would be sufficient for the working of the University. He suggested that the working funds of the University, at present the 'Cullen and University Fund,' should be styled the 'University Fund,' and that a committee of three, to be appointed by the Irish bishops, should form a board of trustees. It was proposed, at the instance of the Propaganda, that the College of Maynooth should cease to enjoy its past and present sort of uncanonical half-exemption from the authority of the ordinary of the diocese in which the College is situated; and that an appeal to the Propaganda for the decision of the Archbishop of Dublin be permitted in certain cases, The supreme authority over Maynooth, and also over the Irish College in Paris, is a present in the hands of a large number of bishops, and, in the case of Maynooth, of some laymen also. These gentlemen meet for an hour or two on two occasions every year, and only one of these meetings is held at Maynooth, and none of them are ever held in Paris. It must be obvious to every one, that such bodies, having such trifling reletions with these institutions, and practically so remote from them, are far less suitable depositories of supreme power than a single bishop, and such a propagation as the Propaganda would be. Besides, there is too much of secularism, and what resembles constitutionalism, in those boards and committees. The Irish bishops ought to feel happy that the Propaganda should condescend to relieve them from the trouble and annoyance inseparable from the administration and supervision of such establishments. What do they want but meek and holy priests to minister to the spiritual wants of their flocks? And from what quarter can they obtain them, if not from the training schools and colleges under the direct influence of the Propaganda?"

"The prelates almost unanimously declined to confer on the University the right of supervision solicited for it. They appear still determined to claim for themselves the supreme direction of even the University itself. They, however, consented to prolong for three years more the extraordinary powers exercised so wisely by the present very reverend and learned rector. It is most desirable that greater unnanimity among the prelates, and greater confidence in the working and ultimate success of that establishment, and a prompt revival of the first feeling of the priests and people, should raise it to a rank worthy of Rome and of Catholic Ireland; and that no future case will arise for withholding contributions. Many of the bishops were of opinion that there was not sufficient cause for the representations forwarded to Rome by some of Archbishop Cullen's over-zealous admirers, regarding the anti-Catholic officiousnes and the imprudence of certain inspectors of the National Schools. However, bishops and priests will be vigilant; and it is to be hoped that no rashness will afford a pretext for the old and angry disputes regarding these schools or for troublesome consequences.

"It was thought unadvisable by all the prelates excepting two or three, to give to any one bishop supreme authority over the instructors and education of the nominal clergy of Ireland. Such a suggestion they believed could come from the Propaganda only on unfounded apprehensions; and it was believed by them that an immediate consequence of its adoption would be the withdrawal of the grant. There are some difficulties regarding the views of Cardinal Burnabo and Dr. Cullen regarding the College des Irlandais, but they are considered far from insuperable. These prelates appear to set a very high value on the grant to Maynooth, but there are many good and prudent men who hold a different opinion. If the Maynooth grant were now withdrawn, the withdrawal of grants to all denominations would soon follow, and that this would be a satisfactory compensation the Cardinal and the delegates do not deny. Be this as it may, it is certain that the spirit and teaching of all Irish seminaries and schools would at once become more in harmony with the idea inculcated in the Roman schools. Moroover, so long as Maynooth continues what it is, there are reasons to fear that the ecclesiastical faculties of the Catholic University must continue a sinecure."

AN EVICTION SCENE.

A Meath correspondent of the Dundalk Democrat, thus describes an eviction to which he was an eye witness:

As frightful and as heartrending a scene as ever was witnessed by the eyes of man took place a few days ago in this county. Nine houses were entered by the crowbar brigademen, and the terror-stricken inhabitants, beyond sixty in number, turned out to the road, and left at the mercy of the landlord.

The lease of this townland expired some short time since, and the tenants were immediately served with notice to quit. They owed no rent—for that which is usually paid in October has been paid by them. They have offered the landlord a fair rent, and more than a fair rent, that they might be allowed to live on the land which their forefathers held from time immemorial, and which they have fertilized and bedewed with the sweat of their brows; but every claim put forth by these poor people has been disregarded, and it appears now very clearly that they will not get their land on any consideration. After being served with notice to quit, they lived in fear and trembling till the day of their expulsion came.

On the morning of the 29th of July, I saw from an eminence several groups of constabulary hastening to the scene of action. They were all halted at a barrack which stands a little way from the scene of eviction. A little while, and I saw the landlord, sheriff, and four bailiffs, coming at a rapid pace. They too, drew up to the barrack. The forces, after being drilled for a few minutes in the barrack yard, were then turned out rank and file, and marched on to serve as a covering party to the sheriff and his employers. Arrived before the first of the devoted houses, they drew up in a very imposing manner, keeping at a regular distance from the sheriff and crowbarmen. Here there was a vast crowd of people standing motionless, and awaiting in death-like silence the signal. At last the sheriff and four bailiffs advanced to the door of the house, which stands about two perches off the road, and rapped, but got no admittance. Then one of the bailiffs caught the handle of the door and shook it. This filled every breast with awe, and you could hear moans and lamentations rising from every part of the vast multitude. The door was soon forced and driven inwards. That moment a little girl about nine years old, ran out crying and wailing, followed by two feeble old men, much terrified. Then old pots and crocks, and chairs and tables, and chests, beds, and bedclothes were carried out and huddled together in endless confusion. The fire was quenched, a handful of thatch pulled down, a twig stuck in the door, and this closed the first scene.

On then to the next house went the brotherhood, followed by the covering party. The door of this house, not being very strong, soon yielded to a huge stone, which one of the bailiffs handled with remarkable dexterity. This house quickly shared the fate of the first—it was gutted, closed, and handed over to the landlord. The inmates of the third house hearing that they would be let in again, and wishing to save their little furniture from the rude hand of the baliff, gave peaceable possession. The inhabitants of the other six houses did in like manner, so that during the remainder of the process, the brotherhood had a very easy and pleasant walk over. The work was all done about 4 o'clock—the people were evicted, and the poor peelers marched back to their respective stations, tired and hungry. Such a scene I never witnessed before, and I hope I shall never see its like again. What will become of these poor industrious creatures I don't know, nor do they know themselves. Their doom, I fear, is sealed, and they will soon have to wander about homeless and houseless, without having a place wherein to lay their heads. They may go to America, or to the poorhouse, unless they be allowed to rest and throw up huts on the outlets of some other man's property. When this system of extermination, which has covered the fair face of the country with dismal ruins and traces of the crowbar-man, shall cease, no one can tell. But we may expect to see these harrowing scenes enacted till a law shall be passed to protect the farmer, and save for himself the fruits of his capital, skill and industry.

Answers to Correspondents.

[NEW-YORK, Sept. 3, 1856.

To the Editor of the "Irish News":]

DEAR SIR—Sitting a few evenings since in the company of a small circle of my countrymen, I was somewhat amused and a good deal edified by a conversation which soon warmed into an energetic and earnest debate, and which embraced topics certainly of the first importance to Ireland. The great subject of discussion was the probable consequences of a successful revolution in that country—whether it would be able to organize a government of its own, and maintain itself as a free and independent Republic in peace and prosperity; or annex itself, for protection, to some other republic; or, as some of them expressed it, degenerate into a monarchy? The first proposition elicited but few remarks of any kind—every one held his opinion in silence, as though he wished to be tacitly understood; but the third was rejected by unanimous vote—and it would be hard, judging from the temper of the company, to suppose that any man in the ideal republic would ever be able to make himself absolute, at the expense of the People's liberties. The whole attention of the little party was now directed to the second proposition—advocated so far by one only—that of consolidating the institutions and resources of the young republic by annexation with some strong and well-established government of a kindred sort. It will be easily seen that the United States were soon pointed out as the best, the only suitable ally in such a case, and in an hour after the original question was brought up, we were fast discussing the prospects of Ireland, as a new member of the American Confederation. The advantages of such annexation were ably maintained and enumerated by one of the company, and, though he was warmly opposed, the majority on adjournment would have voted him right. It was maintained—

1. That Ireland would thus become one vast depot for most of the commercial and postal intercommunication between Europe and America.

2. That a large amount of the business of the customers would be transacted there.

3. That that island would be the regular station and resort of all the American fleets in the eastern Atlantic waters.

4. That Ireland would be free, having a constitution of her own, and a legislature to make her own laws, and being prosperous and happy above temptation, she could not be deluded out of her liberty by corruption; and having the greatest nation on earth to stand in her defence, she could not be robbed of it by force of arms.

5. That the vast number of her population at home, and of her friends abroad, would enable her always to influence the national policy in her own favor, surrounded, as she would be with the mercantile interest of the world; that she would, in short, soon become the empire state of the Union.

6. That being near to Europe, and being politically part of America, Ireland would soon become the seat of learning and refinement, as well as of wealth and material strength; and that golden age would be revived, which is to Irishmen of the present day, as the memory of a glorious sunset to the weary and benighted traveller.

Hoping you will please give us your opinion on a matter which may one day take more practical shape; and hoping, too, that the dark series of centuries which have passed over Ireland since her first connection with England, and which seem to form the nights of nations, may soon be at end, and she may be permitted to behold the return of the glorious day which preceded it,

We respectfully subscribe ourselves,
Your affectionate friends and countrymen.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, SEPT. 27, 1856.

THE TURBULENT DEMOCRACY.

If the European press in the service of Monarchy were to be believed, the downfall of the American Republic is at hand. The fierce disorders in Kansas—recent scenes of strife in Washington—the tempestuous war now raging between the North and the South upon the Presidential question—everything portends the speedy wreck of this great commonwealth. In London, in Paris, in Vienna, it is so written.

From the very turbulence which inspires the prophets of evil, men nearer the scene deduce conclusions the opposite of those which prevail in Europe. This very turbulence is but the surging and overflowing of a vitality which insures a thousand years of strength, activity, commerce and prowess to America.

"Without bile," said Napoleon, "great battles cannot be won."

Restlessness, discontent, turbulence if you will, are the life and soul of the world, and the great achievements of the world.

Had the infant Hercules been asleep in his cradle, snoring sweetly in perfect innocence and contentment, instead of crying lustily and kicking the clothes about him, the serpents sent to kill him, would have made short work of him. For liberty, let there be no sleep. For the American Republic, let there be no rest, until amongst the authorities of this earth, the Republic is supreme. Like the young god, it must keep wide awake, if it desires to be a full-grown Hercules—the cleanser of something worse than Augean stables—the accumulated heap of centuries of wrong—the tamer of the proud and cruel ones of earth—the avenger of the world.

What has this restlessness, this discontent, this turbulence not done for the world, for history, for humanity? What have the People—the huge Democracy—the tempestuous Multitude in every age accomplished for the the glory of all lands?

Machiavelli, in his life of Castruccio Castrucani, says, it is a wonderful thing to consider, that all those, or the greater part of them, who have done the grandest exploits upon earth have been born in some obscure place, or of base and abject parents.

If as a philosopher he was false, as an historian, Machiavelli was as true as steel to the lightning. Not a doubt of it. All, or a greater part of the blessings conferred upon mankind, have been conferred through the instrumentality of the poor and the despised—the men of the people—the dregs and refuse of the people, as Chamberlains and Lords of the Bed-Chamber, as the sensitive scriveners of Royalty would call them. Such were the instruments chosen to preach and propagate the doctrines of Christianity—men who, if alive in our day, dare not pass the threshold of "good society"—not even that over which Sexton Brown presides.

But to exalt the lowly, would appear to be the declared method of the Ruler of the Universe, in his workings with his creatures. The only kings directly appointed by God, were chosen by him when occupied with the humblest labors—the one searching for his father's ass—the other keeping his father's sheep.

All the great discoveries, of gunpowder, printing, America, electricity, and steam discoveries, that in their turn, one after the other, have revolutionized mankind—have been the results of the genius, the labor, the midnight watchings of the bright children of Democracy—glorious strangers to "good society"—spurned by parchment noblemen when alive, and unworthy of "coming between the wind and their nobility." All that has contributed to impart a gracefulness and witchery to civilization, society and manners, is, from Homer to Wordsworth—from Phidias to Canova and Powers—from Appelles to Corregio, and from Corregio to Copley and West, and from West to Maclise, the Cork man, the gift of men struggling through life with neglect and poverty, and all the ills that wait upon them.

The blind man of Scio, he who has led captive the minds of generation after generation, for thousands of years, was a "strolling vagabond"—as the laws of England would term him—half beggar and half actor. The man, through whose instrumentality the illustrious dead, by the magic power of printing, live again for our improvement, become our companions and bosom friends, was a plain workman of Mentz. The man who, utterly poor and without resources, opened new worlds—who practically created them for the benefit of the old ones—paid to the uttermost farthing the penalty which Heaven exacts from those on whom he has conferred the divine though dangerous gift of genius. The man whose statue, in the midst of such a sea of splendor, eloquence, and enthusiasm, was last week unveiled in front of the City Hall of Boston—he who actually did what Prometheus is fabled to have done, and who mainly assisted in building up the independence of this vast country—was, as all the world knows, a poor, hard-working, hard-handed, meek mechanic. The men who are the suns of the intellectual world, dispensing life and light to myriads of minds—the Chaucers, Spencers, Shakesperes, Miltons—are men of the people—born naked, in Democracy. So, too, were the men who esteemed their lives as nothing in the great cause of the rights and honor of their fellow-men—the Tells, the Hofers, and the Washingtons.

Thus, the people—the poor, the ignorant, the rude—the democracy—the multitude—the mob—have in all times produced the benefactors of the world. Here—between these two oceans—the Pacific and Atlantic—majestic mirrors of their power, their fury, their calmness, invincibility and glory—here is their chosen field. Here shall they thrive and multiply, in storm as in peace, proving in the incalculable aggregate, what in so many fragments, flung here and there, has been throughout all climes and ages proved, that People, under God, is the only true source of power, as it is the exhaustless fountain of piety, heroism, and genius.

THE CONGRESS OF PARIS AND THE UNITED STATES.

The late Congress of Paris, after having satisfactorily settled the difficulties which led to the recent disastrous war, took up for consideration the proposition which the United States Government has for some time past been urging: The right of neutrals in time of war to have their ships and property protected from the depredations of the belligerents. The principle was one of such obvious justice and propriety, that the Plenipotentiaries could not refuse their assent to its incorporation into the established principles of international law. But in order to deprive our people of the benefits which might accrue to them from the establishment of this great principle, which they were among the first to advocate, England and France, jealous of our great and rapidly increasing commercial power, determined to add to this another proposition, which they knew we could not accept, or which, if accepted, would render us almost powerless for naval defence against such an adversary as either of these Powers. This new principle which they desired us to accept, is, "Privateering is and remains abolished." They then succeeded in inducing the other Powers represented in the Congress to add a proviso, declaring that no power should have the benefit of the first principle unless the second were also accepted.

To the communication announcing this action, our able Secretary of State has responded with great skill and diplomacy, and it is amusing to mark the impression which his answer has made upon the different journals in England and France. The best proof of the sagacity of that answer is that it seems to have set them all by the ears, no two of them seeming to agree in their views of the dispatch.

The substance of Mr. Marcy's answer is, that the United States will accept the proposition for the abolition of privateering, provided the other Powers will agree that all private property shall in time of war be regarded as sacred at sea, to the same extent that it would be if on land.

A portion of the English press favors the suggestion of Mr. Marcy, and hopes that it will be engrafted upon the law of nations, while another portion treats his proposal as an absurdity, and discusses his arguments with great severity. They say to him, "It is not because privateers destroy private property that we object to them, but because they are irresponsible, mercenary in their objects, and likely to commit the most lawless outrages." It is singular to remark how humane and philanthropic these Englishmen have recently become, but it is equally singular how rapidly their humanity and justice vanish when they happen to clash with their interests. Who would imagine that the same nation that objects to the employment of privateers by another nation, because they are lawless and actuated only by a desire for gain, should have been the same Power that, within the memory of persons now living, sent a mercenary band of Hessians into this country, to plunder the sheep-folds, cowyards, and hen-roosts of their American brethren. How can we reconcile these humane and beautiful sentiments, which would rob war of its terrors, with those which led to the employment of Indians to burn the dwellings and scalp the wives and children of our Revolutionary heroes?

The fact is, the Congress of Paris laid a trap for this government, but we are not caught yet. If they are so anxious to refine and humanize war as to desire to abolish privateering, we say to them we are willing to go further, and agree to carry on warfare between the public armed ships of the belligerents upon the most approved principles of the duello. And we might add to our answer, though it might not suit the courtesy of the diplomatic language, that we will not be outdone in national humanity by the oppressor of Ireland, the despoiler of India, the robber of the Orleans family, the partitioners of Poland, or the persecutors of Hungary and Italy.

THE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE.

The assurances received of the unqualified support of James Buchanan, by the states whose votes is calculated to insure success, is gratifying in the extreme. With bigotry on the side of Fillmore, and intolerance on that of Fremont, the liberal and enlightened principles of Buchanan stand in remarkable contrast.

It would appear to be a political enigma, of difficult solution, whether or not Fremont is a Roman Catholic—a circumstance he staunchly denies, but which challenged the attention of his Know-Nothing adversaries at an early date, and which continues still to occupy their attention.

There is nothing so strangely inconsistent as the position of human beings, consolidated in the organization of party, crying aloud for the support of the principles guaranteed by our Constitution and Bill of Rights, yet falsifying them in bold and determined action. The Know-Nothings do this in proclaiming that religious rights must be so subverted, that if a man be a Roman Catholic, he cannot be President of the United States. The Fremont party commit the same treason against the Constitution, by proclaiming and endeavoring to establish that the southern members of our Confederacy shall not be permitted to inhabit territory with those whose labor they can command, although long since deliberately defined as the settled law of the land.

The Democratic party, it is charged, have permitted outrages in Kansas. They have allowed the Free-Soilers to be disturbed and molested in the peaceful enjoyment of the territory, and they must therefore be put out of power and place. The South must be taught a lesson that will serve to tame and subdue it, and the North must do all it can to oppose the progress of slavery.

These and many other silly and unrighteous cries are made use of to stimulate political action in favor of what is called the Republican cause. To oppose the progress of slavery may be a very noble act, when done with justice and propriety. If slavery be wrong, it should be abolished by the pure elements of Right. Uselessly to wage war on the South, contrary to the covenant, Constitution, and law, for the purpose of effecting the abolition of slavery, argues a recklessness of behavior unworthy an intelligent mind or a good citizen.

If there were outrages in Kansas, they occurred in the natural course of events, where men have quarrelled about jurisdiction over soil, where their interests were in opposition to each other. The Kansas Bill intended the settlement of the country in the usual course of industrial enterprise. The Emigrant Aid Society, organized in the North, contemplated an entire engrossment of the soil. The men of Missouri, being in the vicinity, beheld this with jealousy and alarm. They did not consider this fair play. Personal encounters took place, such as are to be expected in wild districts, where men are prone to depend on their strength of arm rather than on the mild and inoffensive weapons of reason and law.

The administration were not and could not be expected immediately to control this insubordinate material, and reduce the confused and conflicting elements to order and consistency. It is an illogical and dastardly charge to assert that the troubles in Kansas are in any way to lie at the door of the Government at Washington; or in the least degree chargeable to the Democratic party. Men will come to fisticuffs for the most indifferent causes, although conscious of being exposed to the observing eye of the law and under the very nose of the police.

The quarrels of men in remote territories are sure to be appeased by those who are legitimately appointed to administer the laws. But suppose for the sake of argument, that instead of the power to settle the strife in Kansas being committed to the Democratic party—that stands disinterestedly, a national party, knowing no section of party in particular, but doing equal and impartial justice to all—it is placed in the hands of a party already exclusively confined to regard alone the views of Northern fanatic Abolitionists, and utterly overrule the interests and rights of the South. Will this be just and right? Will this tend to cement the bonds of political brotherhood? Will this give peace to Kansas, the country at large, or contribute to the prosperity of the Union? If the disunionists and abolition party should gain political ascendancy in the present contest for Chief Magistrate—one who should be chosen alone for the wise and national principles he represents—it would be a disastrous thing for the unity and vitality of this Republic. The election of Fillmore would be a more supportable evil. He could proscribe the Catholic and insult his Faith, but the contemptible effort would be no stigma, and rising from the depression of the moment—like a giant refreshed from sleep—would soon purify the political atmosphere from the putrifactions which stifle it. We cannot but consider that even a political victory would be the inevitable death of the Know-Nothing party—a veritable bubble, inflated by the foul breath of bigotry, and certain to collapse from inevitable external pressure. The success of Fremont would be a grievous wound in the very heart of our body politic—the Union of the States.

This threatened calamity may be avoided. The blow contemplated may be parried and turned aside. If effected, we fear it will prove mortal.

LORENZO B. SHEPARD.

On the 19th inst., in the thirty-sixth year of his age, departed this life, Lorenzo B. Shepard. The public press has chronicled the melancholy event of his demise—the official duties which, while living, he discharged—the political action which distinguished his career, and the ceremonies attending his obsequies.

We, too, would add the expression of our heartfelt sorrow, that one so gifted, so valuable a member of the community, should have passed away, at a period when the powers of his mind were in their full vigor, and the sphere of his usefulness becoming more and more extended. When such a character is removed by death, it is not only a loss to his family and friends, but to society at large. Worth, in the public service, moral and intellectual, is the golden coin which circulates for the general good, and which cannot be withdrawn without prejudice to the interests of the many.

At the Bar, Mr. Shepard distinguished himself as an able and erudite lawyer—an eloquent and accomplished advocate. We consider there is no profession where a weak mind is more readily warped, or an unprincipled one more thoroughly vitiated than at that of the law. The arts by which truth is perverted, falsehood fabricated, and justice withheld, are within the reach of the most ordinary minds practising at the profession. They are too often the means made use of to win success at what is considered but a legal game of hazard. Nobly does he win his forensic honors, therefore, who, like Lorenzo B. Shepard, stands in bold relief from all this—lustrous for his virtues and prized for his intellect and honor. Graceful in his person, courteous in his manners, he rivetted the admiration of his friends and the regard of all with whom he had intercourse. There was nothing in his composition weak, nor in his character rough—but an agreeable union of decision and energy of purpose, with mildness and urbanity.

Those qualities remarkably distinguished him in the political world, in which he performed so prominent a part. Above the asperities of conflicting personal interests, the animosities engendered by party strife, we find Mr. Shepard preserving the unqualified esteem of those whose opinions and purposes were even counter or hostile to his own. It is much to be regretted, that after the severe and arduous conflict between the divisions of the Democratic party, the reconciliation that has taken place, and the prospect of now united and efficient action, that Mr. Shepard did not live to realize the advantages of the eminent position he occupied, and which for a long time had been one of arduous labor without corresponding reward.

The future was opening before him, full in the promise of extensive usefulness and honor,—but it has been ordained that his career on earth should be brought suddenly to a close. It may be considered, however, that his life was not too short for the absolute purposes of the world—he had accomplished much in his time, illustrating the declaration of the wise man, that "wisdom is gray hairs to youth, and an honorable life, is old age." In this regard therefore it may be considered he realized the objects of a salutary ambition, and it is sincerely to be hoped has left behind some enduring evidence of his exertions in a substantial support for his family.

Mr. Shepard was appointed an examiner in chancery in 1845, by Gov. Wright, and he held that office till it was abolished by the new constitution. He was elected delegate from this city to the Convention called to revise the Constitution of the State, and which met at Albany in June, 1846. Although in point of years Mr. Shepard was the youngest member of the Convention he took an influential part in its debates, and was a member of some of its most important committees.

In 1847 and 1848, Mr Shepard was active in politics, siding in the division which broke out in the democratic ranks in the former year, with the national democrats. In 1848, after the removal of Hon. B. F. Butler, by President Polk, and the death of Hon. Chas. McVean, Mr. Shepard was appointed United States District Attorney, which he held until superseded under Gen. Taylor's administration, by Hon. Ogden Hoffman. He still, however, remained active in political life, and in 1850 presided over the Democratic State Convention at Syracuse. The personal relations which existed between the deceased and Mr. Marcy are said to have been of the most confidential nature. He was delegate to every State Convention, we understand, from 1848 down to 1856. In 1852 he acted as one of the delegates from the State of New-York in the Democratic National Convention at Baltimore. In 1853, when the division again occurred in the democratic party of this State, Mr. Shepard, continued to side with the "softs," as they were called, and was considered one of the leaders of that wing. In 1854, he was appointed District Attorney for the city and county of New-York, by Gov. Seymour, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon N. B. Blunt, which appointment he held only until the ensuing election, when he was succeeded by the present incumbent, A. Oakey Hall, Esq.

In 1855, he was nominated and elected to the office of Counsel to the Corporation, and entered upon that office in January last, and continued to hold it up to the time of his death. He was one of the soft delegates from this State to the late Cincinnati Convention, and cast his vote, with those of his colleagues, for Mr. Pierce, and subsequently for Mr. Douglas and Mr. Buchanan. Mr. Shepard was chosen Grand Sachem of the Tammany Society last spring. He was also the Chairman of the United Democratic General Committee of this city.

Mr. Shepard was the author of two or three valuable law books, and also edited an edition of Johnson's Cases.

Mr. Shepard's life and services, are an example for imitation to our young men who aspire to the honorable part to be performed in our party politics. Nothing else can endure or remain unburied, amid its constantly shifting sands, save the column, which is the representative of industry and patriotism.

TERESA ESMONDE.

Miss Teresa Esmonde will give, at the Tabernacle, on Tuesday, the 30th inst., one of those delightful entertainments which have, at intervals, during the past two years, been rapturously applauded by both the press and the public. Miss Esmonde's careful and spirit-stirring selections from the best poets, the graceful elocution, touching sympathy, enthusiastic fervor—the full-toned, yet sweet and musical voice of the fair reader—these completely affect the auditors, and flash before their minds bright heroic visions, or tenderly recall reminiscences, at once "sweet and sad," of the lovely old Isle.

Notwithstanding that our Theatres are just now highly attractive, we have no doubt that the old Tabernacle will be filled to its uttermost by an appreciative audience on the 30th inst. Nor should it be otherwise. After the cares, the labors, the bread-struggles of the day, what can be more refreshing than to gather in the temple, and around the young votaress of the Bardic line from Ossian to Davis, and listen to her hymning, three thousand miles away from home, the national canticles that reflect glory on the Old Land, and win fame for us as a race from the New.

The pleasure derived by thousands from Miss Esmonde's former Readings, will no doubt collect an audience who long for the gratification of again being delighted with the bright enthusiasm and genial influence of the reader.

Standing one night, says an observant friend to us as we write, during one of her "Irish Readings," by the side of a young lieutenant of one of our military companies, the effect produced by her rendition of Davis's Fontenoy, was strikingly dramatic. When she came to that comprehensive couplet—

"The treaty broken ere the ink wherewith 'twas writ could dry;
Their plundered homes, their ruined shrines, their women's parting cry," the young soldier throbbed with silent passion—the contraction of his eyebrows, the muttering of his lips, the clutching of his sword, told of an unsettled vow, if ever opportunity was afforded, to remember Limerick and British faith, and to emulate the glorious heroism of the victors of Fontenoy.

Miss Esmonde's programme for the occasion we announce, embraces not only gems from Moore, Griffin, Davis, D. F. McCarthy, "Speranza," and others, but also—with a just appreciation and respect for the genius of her adopted country—contains some effective selections from Longfellow's Hiawatha.

Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, the distinguished author of Fashion and Famine, has written a fine poem for Miss Esmonde, entitled the Convict Ship. The name suggests the theme as well as its treatment. The story brings some historical scenes of late years vividly to mind. Of the hero, the author writes—

"Like common felons, he was bound,
A Slave, beyond the ocean's swell—
The slave of England's haughty power—
A branded convict by the laws:
The hero of one glorious hour—
The martyr of a deathless cause."

It is too often said, that our people cannot appreciate such intellectual treats as these Dramatic Readings. This is said tauntingly by those who revile Ireland and Irish genius. Mrs. Mowatt Ritchie, one of the brightest ornaments of the American Stage, says: "There are no more discriminating dramatic audiences than those in Ireland." Cannot the same be said of the Irish here, who with every incentive to earn money, ought to take credit for spending some of it at least in patronizing Irish genius.

DEFENCE OF GENERAL WALKER.

William T. Johnson, one of the Americans who were made prisoners by the Costa Ricans after the battle of Santa Rosas has published a letter defending General Walker, and denying that he, Johnson, signed the vulgarly stupid attack on the Nicaraguan President, lately published in our city papers, and announced as emanating from some seven of Walker's army. In the address alluded to, General walker was abused with a virulence and vindictiveness which completely overshadowed the purpose sought to be effected. He was denounced as lacking in principle, talent, courage, and in fact every thing which goes to make up the hero or the statesman.

Walker's career is of itself sufficient to fling such statements, and all who make them, into disrepute; but still, however unnecessary in fact, the letter of Mr. W. T. Johnson is gratifying, not only as testimony against the foes of Nicaragua, but as a defence of the writer, in removing from him and his comrades the stigma which would and should attach to them as the signers of the foul document to which their names were appended. Mr. Johnson says that the circular from beginning to end is a tissue of falsehoods, that his signature was annexed to it without his consent, and that his comrades signed it under intimidation.

Mr. Johnson has done well to take the earliest opportunity of clearing himself and his friends and comrades from such disgrace; and we joyfully take notice of the fact, having promptly met the statements of the circular at the time it appeared, and as promptly denounced the parties, or rather the stated parties to its inception and publication.

EMMET'S MONUMENT.—We are reminded by the Life of Emmet, just issued by Haverty, of Fulton street, that on the 20th of this month fifty-three years ago, Robert Emmet yielded his life for the great cause of Fatherland. This work is the only monument to the young chief yet. Would it not be well to remind ones-self of the heroism and misfortunes of that day? Haverty's edition is the best and most complete work referring to the Emmets. We have an article in type on the subject, which we are obliged to hold over for our literary page next week.

THE FORTUNES OF CASEMENT O'REILLY.

HIS ADVENTURES IN AMERICA.

BY GARLAND O'HALLORAN.

"And so you have resolved to emigrate, my poor boy," said Father Casement, in a voice of uneasy inquiry. "Isn't it odd that you never consulted me while you were forming your determination? There was a time, Case darling, you kept no secrets from your uncle. But take your punch, at any rate, my boy, for sorrow's dry, and sure in a hundred years or so, it'll be no matter whether its you that have changed, or I that have grown unworthy of your confidence!"

Nothing could exceed the earnest tenderness and anxiety with which the little priest jerked out these incoherent sentences. In truth, he had long been pained by his nephew's silence; but his natural delicacy forbade intrusion upon sorrow so deep and complicated that, to its morbid sensibility, even a word of sympathy might have been mistaken for impertinence. He said not a word while he saw his nephew struggling manfully to accustom himself to his altered fortunes; but now, when that crisis seemed overpast, and the resolve was taken—a resolve in which he was as deeply interested as it is possible for one human being to be in the fate of another—his anxieties overcame him, and he fell back, pale and trembling, in the chair from which he had partly risen.

It was some minutes before the nephew thought him strong enough to hear what he now wished to communicate; nor would he resume the conversation until a fair supply of the priest's favorite medicine had been imbibed.

"You wrong me indeed, dear Uncle," he began, "in supposing that my long silence has been deliberate, and still more by the suspicion that my love for you has changed. Have you not drawn me nearer, if that were possible, since other friends began to fall away? I have now no adviser but you—no friend but you—no father but you; and if so worthless a thing as the balance of my life could add another to your years of usefulness and charity, it should be freely given. Do not embitter our separation by suspecting me of change. You are too just to punish where the offence was unavoidable. I could not tell you of my resolve before, seeing that it was only formed last night."

"God bless you for those tears, my boy!" whispered Father Casement, in a husky under-tone. "I would rather feel them on my hand than be called the bishop of the diocese. They possess the sincerity which is beyond the price of gold. But sit down, now—sit down and take off your punch; it will open your eyes to a more hopeful world; and then tell me all about your future plans."

"Well, then," replied the nephew, endeavoring to force a smile to his pale cheeks, "I will imagine for the nonce that you are in full canonicals, and confess as completely as if I were about to ask for absolution. Until last night I had no plan. I did not think myself at liberty to form one, for I could not believe Alice faithless, and still hoped against hope, that what seemed dubious in her conduct was the result of family coercion. But chance blew away that hope last evening, and I bless chance for doing it!

"We met by accident under St. Ronan's Cliff. She had been out with a boating party, but by some means got separated from her friends. It was such an interview as I had long prayed for. Its unexpectedness made prevarication impossible. She seemed to feel this, and strove to avoid me—at least to avoid any allusion to the subject which lay next my heart.

"I pressed for an explicit answer, and finally she avowed that her breach of faith, though advised and countenanced by her friends, was adopted as her own act and deed. She justified her conduct by my altered position, and pleaded that 'a proper respect for the different gradations of society'—those were her very words, by heavens!—a proper respect and so forth, forbid her any longer to continue an engagement which fate had indefinite-postponed! She told me that hereafter I would thank her for what now seemed cruel; and in this, if in nothing else," he exclaimed, rising and striding nervously around the little room,—"in this, at least I believe her with my whole soul. What would have been my fate if chained to such a thing of pride and heartlessness!

"I confess you were right, Uncle, in all you told me of her long ago—and for which I could have torn another man's tongue out at the time. And yet, she never looked more magnificently beautiful than while thus speaking. The imperious calmness with which she trampled down all memories of the past—her former vows, my love, our mutual promises—did more to separate me from her in an instant, than could a century of absence. Let me do her the credit to believe that she knew and intended this. The icy indifference of her manner, produced in me a corresponding chill. She had wounded a spirit as haughty and unbending as her own; and when I took my leave of her for ever, on seeing her friends approach, I was astonished to find how patiently I bore a blow, the mere contemplation of which but an hour before made death seem the less bitter alternative.

"But it is well we met, for nothing but her own act could have broken the fascination in which she had enthralled my soul. I am free now," he added with bitter emphasis, "free to go whithersoever I will, and seek my fortune wherever 'tis easiest to be found. I have still money enough left to carry me away; I have youth, a fair share of strength, and lastly a most resolute will to succeed in whatever calling chance or necessity may lead me to adopt. With God's blessing and your consent, Uncle, I shall be on my travels before another week."

"Spoken like a Christian and an O'Reilly!" exclaimed the priest, whose tears fell freely as he caught his nephew's hand. "Never lose sight of God. Be resolute in Will, and a Way will be opened up for your advancement—come it late or soon. Much as I love you and shall feel your absence, you have my blessing and consent, and every thing else that I can give to aid you. Travel, if it does nothing else for you, will divert your feelings into healthier channels; at any rate, it cannot prejudice your rights, whether you are there or here, until after your Uncle's death."

This latter sentence was uttered more in a tone of reverie than conversation.

"What rights do you allude to?" questioned Casement, hurriedly. "How could I possibly be affected, either for good or evil, by the death of my father's brother? Are not 'the brats,' as he affectionately styles them, in my way?"

The priest loooked confused for a moment, as a man will look on finding that he has accidentally revealed, or even called attention to a point which it was his object to keep secret. Having the grace to be very awkward in prevarication, he stammered out a general denial of any particular meaning, and endeavored to divert the questioner's thoughts by asking in what country he intended to settle?

"What country?" echoed Casement, in surprise.

"Yes, what country?" repeated his Uncle, happy in the hope that the other's more embarassing question had been parried. "Is it so strange that I should ask in what country you mean to court the favors of the fickle goddess?"

"To me it seems the strangest question in the world," answered Casement, "as strange as if one were to ask a suffocating man whether he did not think a little fresh air in his lungs would be of service?

"Ah, Uncle!" he continued more briskly, "the times are gone by for ever when an O'Reilly, an O'Donnel, or O'Neil, weary of the misery he saw around him, or beaten in an attempt to relieve it, could volunteer his sword to Spain, or France, or Austria, in hopes by his gallantry to win not only honor for himself, but also the attention of Europe to the hell-born policy of which his island was, and is the victim! All the Counts, Dukes, Marshals, Admirals and Marquises' of those three names, whose monuments you find in Europe, were the creations of a different age. The uprising of Liberty in France banded all tyrannies together; and nothing is surer now than that every nation must attain freedom for itself or for ever remain enslaved.

"To what country then should an Irishman go save to that where the happier portion of his race have already found a safe and honorable shelter? Where the altar is inviolable—the earth bounteous—the dignity of labor acknowledged, and where all the rights of citizenship save one, the highest—are guaranteed to the countrymen of those foreigners who helped to rear the stately fabric that it might afterwards become a refuge to the children of the oppressed throughout the world? To where but to the land of Washington—the land whose brightest laurels were bound around the iron brow of Andrew Jackson, an Irish peasant's son—to where but to America should an Irishman, whose soul is not for sale, betake himself in this nineteenth century?"

"Bravo, my boy!" exclaimed Father Casement, who had been engaged in another brew while his nephew spoke. "By the stiffest bristle in Goliah's beard, you must take the 'stump' when you get there—I believe 'stump' is the word—and perhaps it's as an ambassador they'll send you home. It's a grand career, I believe.

"Grander than the mind can easily grasp," interrupted O'Rielly, whose mind kept harping on the topic which his uncle seemed so anxious to have forgotten. "But you mistake my views entirely; I go there to enjoy freedom, not to teach it; to exercise uprightly the privilege which the Constitution extends, and to assist, whenever called upon, to strengthen and defend the land which has given me shelter. But you have not answered my late question. What could you mean by speaking of certain rights of mine which might or might not be prejudiced by my absence at the time of Matthew O'Rielly's death?

Father Casement looked uneasy, and turned himself once or twice in his chair before giving any response. He sighed heavily more than once, and then threw himself on his nephew's generosity.

"I had a meaning in my words," he began, but one which I myself can hardly comprehend or analyze: it is built upon emotions more than on facts—it is a conviction arising without any tangible arguments to back it. I never intended you should know it, though I never than now felt more confident that it is true and will eventually be proved so."

"I anticipate what you would say," exclaimed the young man, in a tone of the deepest excitement. "I have had a dream of this kind, or of something like it, myself. You believe that this so-called uncle of mine is an imposter, who has merely possessed himself of my real uncle's papers and confidence! He does not act like an O'Reilly—think like an O'Reilly—write like an O'Reilly—talk like an O'Reilly! He has a felon-eye, and there is something in his gait (for I have often seen him when he did not know it,) which impressed me with an irresistible belief that he had been for long years a prisoner. Tell me it is so, and I will drag him out of the house whose memories he pollutes, before another hour! Tell me it is so"——

"Stop—stop—stop!" cried Father Casement, springing from his chair with an activity scarcely to be expected from one of his years and figure. "The boy is as mad as one March hare and two mad dogs! The uncle you picture so villainously is one of the finest-looking men in the country. Even were he the ugliest, you should be the last to proclaim it; for your features are almost identical. The expression of your face is less headstrong than his, but otherwise you are the born image of what Matthew was more than thirty years ago. How passion blinds us, to be sure! The man is your father's brother as surely as you are your mother's son. What romantic trash have you been reading to put this absurdity—this frenzy, into your head? If he wanted any one to swear to his identity, I would do it myself. You must put a curb on your imagination, or it will ruin all."

"Then tell me, in Heaven's name, what you did mean?" exclaimed Casement, breathlessly.

"You are not now in a condition to hear it, nor am I to tell you," replied the priest. "I ask you, as the test of the confidence which you declare you place in me, that you will not press this matter now, but satisfy yourself with the assurance, that when it can avail you to be told, I will be the first and most eager to announce it. I will place in your hands a letter not to be opened until your foot is on American ground. It will tell you my suspicions and direct you what course to take. Can you trust me so far as to crush your curiosity until then, with the belief that the course I recommend is that which you yourself would adopt were you in my place, and could look on matters with eyes unprejudiced by passion?"

The young man hesitated.

"It is a heavy test, I am aware," continued Father Casement, "nor would I subject you to it except from a deep conviction of its absolute necessity. If your uncle once takes the alarm, it will matter nothing whether my surmises—and they as yet are mere surmises—are authentic or unfounded. He would surround his course with double caution, and all our efforts would be fruitless."

"Can you not even give me a hint?" uttered Casement, hoarsely. "It is suspense that kills—anxiety is torture."

"I would give half that I am worth," replied Father Casement solemnly, "to recall the words that led to this embroglio. I would tell you cheerfully if I dared trust your self-command, or did not know that in all human probability it would be the downfall of our hopes"——

"I cannot help myself, I suppose," interrupted the nephew, in a tone of bitter disappointment. "But you promise to let me know on my arrival in America?"

"You shall carry the letter in your pocket. I swear it by my habit, and on my honor as a man. Are you content?"

"Well, I suppose I must be," exclaimed Casement, shaking off his peevish curiosity. "It now only remains to reach New-York as fast as possible; for, till I get there, every hour will seem a year."

In less than a week from that time, Casement, accompanied by Ned Morgan, one of the former gamekeepers of Castleronan, set out for Liverpool, from thence to take the first sailing vessel that offered passage to America. By advice of the priest, the young adventurer caused a report to be circulated that he was off for Australia—so Ned Morgan honestly believed, and so he said; but to Ned all parts of the world were much the same, provided only he could remain "in the young masters still company."

CHAPTER III.

A LIVERPOOL EMIGRANT SHIP—MRS. MOONEY AND THE MATE—A MUTINY AND TRIUMPH—SUPERCARGO OR DOCTORS—WHICH?

"Behold the duteous son, the sire decayed,
The modest matron, and the blushing maid,
Forced from their homes—a melancholy train—
To traverse climes beyond the western main."—Goldsmith.

"One strong man's will is armor for a thousand."—Churchill.

No one even remotely acquainted with the details of immigration need be told that the deck of an emigrant ship ten days at sea, presents an alarming contrast to the paradisal pictures drawn by the fertile imagination of the shipping agents previous to her departure from port. Sea-stores deteriorate unaccountably the moment the vessel loses sight of land; and biscuits, which were white and sweet, when exhibited as samples at the ticket office, are transmogrified into a miserable blue-mouldy mixture—half-bran, half-dirt—when delivered in half the promised quantities to such claimants as are strong enough to demand them on the next morning's distribution. The coffee, as Ned Morman remarked, looked and smelt more like "a bag full of bug's eggs" than like any Christian decoction of the berry. There had been a mistake, the mate admitted, in the prime mess beef: that paid for by the agents was of the first quality, but that put on board by accident was some which had returned, unused, from a three years voyage in the belly of a Yankee whale-ship.

It was duly recorded on the printed contracts which the emigrants had been supplied with, that any complaints for inferiority or insufficiency of food would be promptly redressed by the captain, if appealed to; in fact, according to Messrs. Cheatem & Snap, of Manesty Lane, the captain was the worst enemy the shippers had, never thinking anything good enough for "his family," as he called the passengers—often giving the greater part of his cabin stores to supply them with luxuries, and eternally taking their part, whether right or wrong, in any quarrel they might have with the charterers, on the arrival of his vessel at her destination. It was also set forth, ostentatiously, that all manner of legal redress might be had for any breach of contract, by entering a complaint at the termination of the voyage; but the modus in which this redress was to be applied for was nowhere stated, nor was it likely that a set of half-starved, half-suffocated, wholly ignorant immigrants, just landed in a new country and eager to find their friends, would devote their first days of liberty to seeking the punishment of those from whose clutches they had thankfully escaped.

The shipping agents in Liverpool and their confederates the "runners," here, are well aware of this, and use their advantage to the utmost. "The horrors of the middle passage" from Africa, were surpassed by the sufferings inflicted on free immigrants from Europe. In the former case, it was the interest of the captain to bring in his cargo in "good marketable condition;" in the latter, the more that died or leaped overboard on the way, the less would be the quantity of sea-stores used by the survivors.

Casement O'Reilly had taken cabin passage in "that fine, fast sailing, and seaworthy clipper ship, the Vulture, Hezekiah Runt, Captain." Ned Morgan had a berth in the second cabin, and there were four hundred and eighty human beings stowed away in the steerage and amidships—being only one hundred and forty more than the vessel was legally authorized to have on board!

PAT COSTELLO — THE KILKENNY ATTORNEY.

It was the second day after the debate which led to the secession of Young Ireland from the Repeal Association. Conciliation-hall was crowded. In the body of the hall, under the galleries, in the Reporters' box, behind the chair, thousands were closely packed. Ribbons and bonnets filled the space dedicated to the fairer exponents of patriotism. It was a promiscuous collection of portraits. Every type of female beauty shone out from there.

Nor were the less favored types excluded. There was the plain, the sour, the wrinkled. Patriotism has worshippers from every temple. The garden and the garret equally contribute to swell the crowd assembled in its name. Along those benches, towering and curving above the Chair of that spacious hall, the belle of Merrion square, as well as the pickled Xantippe of Leinster market, was seen. The gay Graces of the ball-room, with their lily brows and cheeks of roses, displayed themselves on the same couches with the red-nosed Furies of the fish-stall. These were the two extremes. Between them, flowers of less gaudy coloring or weeds of less stubborn texture were interwoven in bewildering profusion. Old or young, in calico or satin, fair or otherwise, they were the Daughters of Erin. So it was that, in many a stately apostrophe, O'Connell, rolling out in measured music his adjectives of adoration, loved to style them. Every Monday found them on those hallowed seats. Never in such variety and abundance as the day I speak of.

As well as the sterner portion of the audience—the brawny coal-porters, car-men, lawyers, doctors, painters and glaziers, attornies and pick-pockets of which, like every crowd, it was made up—the ladies in the gallery were divided in sentiment on the occasion. Some were devoted to Young Ireland. Others were partizans of its aged antagonist. The contending sympathies broke out in smiles, in frowns, in ejaculations of love, in broken syllables of anger, from scarfs which waved encouragement, or from humbler kerchiefs which swept the chandeliers and ceiling in Vixen scorn or Amazonian hate. The Graces were unanimous for Smith O'Brien and his youthful colleagues. Throbbing and glittering on their thrones, they wove chaplets for the rebellious heads which lifted themselves haughtily against the thunderbolts of the Liberator and the scathing lightnings of Tom Steele. The matured matrons, the Junos of that dusky Olympus of Burgh-quay, showered their favors on the riotous champions of peace and perseverance. So did the Proserpines in faded shawls, and the Furies in tattered Leghorns, with whom those sacred heights were shared.

Of the multitude who on that day heaved and foamed, poured out their eloquence, their legal maxims, their lyric praises of the sword, or their prayers for peace, there is one great figure impressed in pleasant outlines on my mind. Erect in the Committee-box, with protruding waistcoat, broad shoulders, thick flabby hands, double chin, pale greasy face—so greasy that a fly alighting on it would have found it difficult to extricate itself—snuff-colored stick with massive knob of gold, capacious blue frock-coat and a wall of shirt-collar about his face, he stands before me at this moment as distinctly as he did upon that day.

The waistcoat was a lilac cassimere, with buttons of the same material. Coming down well upon the broad hips, and being buttoned up pretty high upon the chest, it had a comfortable look. No one could disassociate from it the idea of good living, an easy life, and a jovial nature. The snuff-colored stick dangled by a black silk cord from a stumpy little finger. It did so on all public occasions. It did so especially when the eminent gentleman it belonged to was making a speech, or when (as he modestly expressed himself) he was "offering a few observaytions to the pint." A rather small head—it looked so, for his gelatinous face overlapped it—furnished with a pair of little gray piggish eyes which roguishly kept twinkling the most of his life, and a heavy coarse mouth the sensuality of which was relieved with a constant play of sly humor, completed the figure. It was Pat Costello, the Kilkenny attorney.

Pat was not a member of the Repeal Association the time of the debate on the Peace Resolutions. He was only thinking of being one. The Whigs having supplanted the Peelites in office, and the tone of the Association having become Whiggish, the sagacious solicitor was under the impression it might do him no harm to put down his pound-note and take out his card. In the eyes of the people it would look patriotic and might serve to help him along to St. Stephen's, for Pat had a mind to try how a seat in Parliament would suit him.

"It won't be displaising to my Lard Marpeth and my ould friends of the Cabinet"—it was thus he bethought himself—"whilst my card of mimbership, as a Repayler, will be a great card for me with any indepindint constituency."

With this he finished his breakfast in the coffee-room of the Reform club, cocked his white hat on his head, winked to himself pleasantly, licked his lips with unctuous delight, and set off for Burgh quay. Picking his teeth with a nicely cut bit of a quill, swinging his gold-headed snuff-colored bamboo, whistling softly, or as softly murmuring a bar or two of some popular air, he sloped down Dawson street, past Trinity College, into Westmoreland street, round the corner of Lundyfoot's, and so on to the Corn-Exchange. He winked all the way, too, occasionally relieving the winks with a smack of his lips, just as he did moving out of the Club.

Here and there on his road, he fell in with a familiar acquaintance. Perhaps it was Brady, the Lord Chancellor. Perhaps it was Mr. James Power, the member for Wexford. Or it might have been James Monahan himself. A few words of conversation took place. Mr. Costello never passed an old acquaintance with a dry nod or a curt how d'ye do. He was sure to ask how the wind blew in Dungarvan; was it safe for the Masther of the Mint; was O'Connor Don to have a "walk over" the coorse at Roscommon; who was to have the Judgeship in case ould Pennefeather coughed himself out of the Queen's Bench; and was it likely anything handsome would be done for George Wyse? Such questions leading deep into politics, and Pat, ascertaining what the Whigs thought of O'Connell and the Repeal agitation, and being strengthened in the conviction with which he set out, would declare his intentions.

At the first blush the avowal would take his friend by surprise. Mr. Costello having held aloof from it so long, what could put it into his head to join the Repeal Association at this time of day? The Lord Chancellor, or whoever else it might be, couldn't for the world understand. He might be mistaken, however. He might have misunderstood Mr. Costello. The Lord Chancellor would set himself right.

"Where to, did you say, Mr. Costello?"

"To be made a Repealer," says Pat.

"A Repealer!" the Lord Chancellor exclaims.

"Nothing short of it—this blessed day I'll be enrolled, with the blessing of God."

"Impossible—what's the good?'

"It's a short road to Parliamint, you know."

"That's the use of it," says Pat; and with that, and a tight wink of his left eye, and a jerk of the gold-headed cane towards his lordship's breast-pocket, and a "good-day," which was as good as a feast of potatoes and butter, Mr. Costello would strike off again.

But that blessed day was too doubtful, wild and stormy for the shrewd Attorney to venture his fortunes in the ship lying bound for London at the lower end of Burgh-quay. There was a mutiny on board. The old skipper wasn't on hand. He was somewhere on the Thames. The Lord only knew what mischief was brewing! 'Twas better to wait, and let the storm blow over, and the mutiny subside. In any case, it was safest to keep clear of the mismanaged ship, until the captain from Derrynane had a hold of the helm. Heaven alone could tell whether these muntineers might not overpower the dumpy lubber in charge of the craft, whilst his father was away, and knock her to splinters right up against Vinegar Hill, or some other infernal rock not laid down in the chart.

Thus it was that our genial friend conjectured, argued and concluded. He did not ask to be admitted into the Association the day he had selected, and some few of the more striking features of which have been noticed in the opening sentences of this chapter. Calmly, most blandly, and as it were paternally, he interposed—imploring from the Committee-box, with the richest brogue, the cessation of strife.

Being sternly reminded, however, by one of the Young Irelanders, that he was no member, and could not, therefore, speak, and this intimation being echoed in a threatening tempest which burst around him and above him, and silenced him in the twinkling of his eye, the benignant mediator took his seat. A few minutes after, when the storm blew somewhat fresher, and everything portended anything but a safe trip that day, Mr. Costello complained of a seidlitz powder he had taken that morning, and whispering to those between him and the door, brushed out.

It was not until Young Ireland had been driven from Conciliation Hall, and under the immediate magistracy of O'Connell the most perfect unanimity had been restored within it, that Pat renewed his intentions of becoming a registered Repealer, and took steps accordingly.

Smith O'Brien was complacently turning the pages of Plato in the sweet old shades of Chairmoyle. O'Gorman was on circuit. Mitchel confined himself to the editorship of the Nation. Devin Reilly busied his hot brain with the working of the National schools, looking up the seeds of a rich and noble future for Ireland in the generation strengthening and blossoming within those quiet white walls. In the shadow of those superb ruins of Cashel, at the foot of the rock on which they lift their gray heads, crowned with ivy to the sun, Doheny found solace in the visions and relics of old times, and the memories of such friends as Davis and McNevin, for the bitterness which the perfidies of O'Connellism produced. In one of the pretty little villages of the Lee, between Cork and Cove, Michael Joseph Barry was putting together the frame of a tiny dainty yacht he had brought with him in a carpet-bag from Dublin, where for the last year he had been writing Kishoge Papers for the University Magazine, and letting off philippics against the Whigs.

A few days previous to the launch, he wrote me a graceful little note, inviting me to accompany him on the trial-trip of his fairy sloop. As I had witnessed it in its shapeless infancy, he was anxious I should enjoy it in its symmetrical maturity. Distrusting his ship-craft, knowing that squalls frequently visited the Lee, and being nothing of a swimmer myself, I declined the invitation; assuring my friend, Michael Joseph, that I had no desire to experimentalize in his boat; that although, to profane the famous antithesis of Grattan, I had "sat by her cradle," I had no ambition "to follow her hearse."

The writer of these Recollections was rambling along the Cliffs of Tramore, boating, fishing, reading alternately Digby's Compitum and D'Israeli's Coningsby, being for the most of the time the companion of a gentleman, once a Captain in an English infantry regiment, who entertained him for hours upon hours with the pleasantest anecdotes of military life in Jamaica. Old Ireland had Burgh Quay all to itself!

Just what Mr. Costello wanted. The very thing he desired, prayed, and waited for. O'Connell himself moved his admission. He did so in the following words—

"I beg to move that Mr. Patrick Costello be enrolled a member of the Association. When he was appointed to a situation under the Courts—namely, the Clerk of the Rules, he consulted me as to whether he should join the Association. I advised him not to do so then. He afterwards, having retired from his office on a pension, still felt anxious to join the ranks of the Repealers. He asked me this day did I not think it was time for him to become an avowed Repealer. I said it was, and I said that I would propose him myself. I, therefore, feel great pleasure in proposing the enrolment of my friend Patrick Costello as a member of the Association."

A few days after this memorable occurrence, I was walking with my friend, James Keating, of Waterford, below the stormwall on the strand of Tramore, when who should come up, with his white hat and gold-headed cane, smiling all over, winking and smacking his lips, but "my bowld Pat himself," as Keating used cordially style him.

"How're you, Keating—how're you, Meagher?"

Pat had a luxuriant brogue, and this greeting rolled from his tongue like a quart of egg-nog from a plethoric brown jug. He joined us, and swinging his stick (that stick will be buried with him), soon had the conversation all to himself. Politics, of course, were his favorite theme, and of politics we had from him, within the space of an hour, more than enough for six columns of solid brevier. Lord Bessborough, the Lord Lieutenant, was a blessed appointment, he said. His Excellency, he knew, wouldn't forget the attornies who returned him to Parliament, when he was Viscount Duncannon.

"At-all-events, he can't forget you," says Keating, with a grave comical look, which was meant to remind him of something which Pat would as soon not have revived. The slightest allusion to it, in fact, always offended his dignity, ruffled his good humor, and interfered with the flow of his wit. But Pat having intimated it was his intention to stand for Kilkenny, whenever a vacancy occurred, Keating had a notion that a little hard rub might do him no harm. He was soaring too high, and a shot under his wing might bring him down gently, with the loss of a few feathers only. Why should the barn-fowl covet the eagle's nest? Waddling and cackling, growing plump and sleek, snapping up morsels dropped him from the windows of Ormond Castle, why should the plebeian bird stretch his stiff pinion for a lumbersome ascent to the battlements crowning, like the diadem of Cybele, the marble city of the Nore?

Some such reasoning flashed through Keating's mind, when, as a delicate check to his presumption, he reminded Mr. Costello of the time he set out at the head of a deputation to Viscount Duncannon, on which occasion, (the first great event in Pat's life), a brother attorney, afterwards one of the Divisional magistrates of Dublin, admonished him in a ballad that was widely circulated, what to avoid, and how to behave in the presence of the Viscount—

"Don't make a bow, says he,
For you don't know how, says he,
No more than a cow, says he;
But stand yer ground, says he,
Like a bull in the pound, says he."

The recollection of this song—though it passed silently like the song of a dream through his brain—was enough. Pat, after two or three minutes' moping and almost lifeless dejection, during which the gold-headed snuff-colored stick hung paralyzed from his little fat finger, and a thousand blue bottles and gnats buzzed through his head from one ear out through the other, wheeled about to another branch of his favorite subject. He dropped Kilkenny and the Earl of Bessborough, as quick as if both had been a couple of red-hot potatoes. This being a favorite illustration of his own, it is appropriate to use it.

SILVER SATURDAY NIGHT.

BY MRS. H. MACNAMARA.

As the laborer rests at the close of the day;
He murmers with heartfelt delight,
To the children around who merrily play,
'Tis silver Saturday night.

The loving group they cluster round,
With faces merry and bright,
And gaily echo the musical sound,
'Tis silver Saturday night.

The laborer's wife is standing near,
With a face of radiant light,
And whispers to her husband dear,
'Tis silver Saturday night.

He glances with a loving smile,
At his wife—his heart's delight—
And murmers to himself awhile,
Thank God, 'tis Saturday night!

The family cluster round the hearth,
With hearts both merry and light;
The laborer singeth a song of mirth,
For he's happy on Saturday night.

FACES IN THE FIRE.

I.

I am gazing all the night-time
At the faces in the fire—
Whilst the roaring rain-storm dashes
On the shaking window sashes,
And the restless, ærial ocean
Rends the boughs, like spars of vessel;
And the billowy commotion
Drives the leaves that with it wrestle,
Like a human cargo splurging,
Washed off from the timbers, surging
In the mad waves, and expire.

II.

And I think how like the life-flame
Are those red shapes I admire:—
First, they're merely indicated,
Then, like childhood, grow elated
With the fresh heat that imbues them,
Then, like youth, hot flames infuse them,
Then, like men, a steady burning
Glows athrough them, till the turning Point of being, makes gray gashes,
And they crumble into ashes
Like mere faces in the fire.

ILLUSTRIOUS IRISHMEN ABROAD.

Translated from the Biographie Universelle.

GEORGE COUNT BROWNE,

A general in the Prussian service, was born in Ireland, in the year 1698, of a Catholic family. He had at an early age a taste for military life, but despairing of advancement in his own country, on account of his religion, he betook himself to Germany, and entered the service of the Elector Palatine. He passed thence into Russia, with Keith, and was promoted rapidly, especially after having rendered important services in the following critical emergency. A conspiracy was formed against the Empress Anne, which Browne effectually crushed, by breaking in upon the conspirators, sword in hand, at the head of a select body of troops, of whose devotion he was fully assured. Shortly afterwards, some great military enterprise gave the Russian generals opportunities to signalize their talents, De Lascy, Munich, Keith made their appearance on the Rhine and the Volga. Browne shared their labors and successes. He made some skillful marches, and with a body of about three thousand men, arrested the progress of the Turkish army on the banks of the Volga. Having fallen into the hands of the enemy, he was conducted to Adrianople, and sold as a slave. He regained his liberty through the good offices of a French officer, and, having informed himself of the Turkish plans for the campaign, escaped from Constantinople and repaired to St. Petersburgh, where his information was gladly received. Shortly afterwards the war broke out with Sweden; Browne was sent to oppose a body of Swedes, which he succeeded in driving from the Russian frontiers, by well combined maneuvres. During the seven years' war, we meet him at the battles of Prague, of Collin, of Jacegerndorf, and of Zorndorf. In this last battle, he was commander-in-chief, and decided the fate of the day by rallying the Russians; but at the same time, he was taken prisoner by the Prussians. Having extricated himself by his presence of mind, he received five sabre cuts on the head, and lay among the dead on the field of battle. He was carried to his quarters, where they gave him the earliest surgical attendance, and thence removed to Petersburgh, when peace was re-established between Russia and Prussia. Peter the Third wished to place Browne at the head of the army which was about to march against the Danes; but the General disapproved of the war and sturdily maintained his opinion. The Emperor, irritated by his contumacy, removed him from the service; bnt in a few days after, his anger having been appeased, Browne was restored to his position, and received the government of Livonia. He rendered the province the most signal services, by checking abuses and protecting the people. A few years before his death, he demanded permission to retire; but Catharine the Second replied, "Nothing but death can separate us." Browne died on the 18th of September, 1792, at the age of 94. When only twenty years old, he had his coffin made, which he often ordered to be brought before him, and contemplated it with the serenity of a hero and a Christian.

ULYSSES MAXIMILIAN COUNT BROWN,

Field Marshal in the service of Austria, was born at Bale, on the 23d of October, 1705, of an Irish family, and distinguished himself in the seven years' war. He first served against the Turks, in 1737, and gave convincing proofs of ability and bravery during the Italian campaign, especially at the battles of Parma and of Guastalla. Being elevated in 1739, to the rank of Field Marshal, he was opposed to Frederick the Second, in the wars of Silesia, and rendered the Empress Maria Theresa important services by checking the progress of her enemy on several occasions. In 1744 he crossed again into Italy with the Prince de Lobkowitz, gained on the 15th of June, 1746, the battle of Placenza, made himself master of Genoa, and returned to Germany in 1752, when he was appointed Governor of Prague. Frederick the Second having attempted in 1756 to penetrate into Bohemia by way of Saxony, Brown gave him battle at Lowositz, and, in seven days after, undertook that celebrated march, the object of which was to deliver the Saxon army besieged in the camp of Pirna. He effected the march, but failed in accomplishing his design. He succeeded, however, in driving the Prussians from Bohemia. This important service procured him the order of the Golden Fleece. But Frederick, though repulsed, gathered together new forces, during his retreat, re-entered Bohemia, the following year, and, on the 6th of May, fought with Count Brown the famous battle of Prague, for a long time disputed, almost equally destructive to both parties, and gained finally by the king. The field-marshal, mortally wounded at the very momeut the Austrians thought themselves certain of the victory, heard a fresh cannonade, while they were conveying him from the field of battle. "The Prussians have recommenced the attack," he cried, raising himself up on the litter. In vain they assured him that this was the announcement of victory. He had a presentiment of the defeat of his troops, a sorrowful apprehension he realized before his death, which did not take place till the 26th of June following. He left behind him not alone the reputation of a good general, but also that of a great statesman. His life is published in German, Prague, 1767. This has been translated into French. OMEGA.

OLIVER CROMWELL; or, England's Great Protector. By HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT, author of "Henry VIII. and his Six Wives," the "Roman Traitor," &c. &c. Miller, Orton & Mulligan.

Dealing, as this fiction does, with the man who made and the actions that illustrate a mighty political revolution, the effect of which is so intimately connected with the history of this republic, it must create a sensation, or rather continue that which it originally produced. "Cromwell" was the second historical romance issued by Mr. Herbert, and though faulty in many minor necessities, it more than made up for the deficiencies of a youthful style by the fervor and force with which the leading characters were limned. In the present edition, the indefatigable author has thoroughly revised, corrected, and in many instances re-written the book; so that while the action of the story remains unchanged, it is rendered of even greater interest by the improved graces of the author's manner. The chief figures in Mr. Herbert's series of historical pictures are well outlined, well colored, and retain the warlike or sanctimonious, proud or prudent, poetic or patriotic idiosyncrasies by which they have held the severer pages of the historian proper. In the third chapter there is a fine, full, picturesque, and appreciative picture of John Milton, very appropriately introduced surrounded by the calm beauty and touching equanimity of a lustrously tranquil evening. It is indeed capital, with a fine sombre touch of poetry about it. We should make extracts, but that not uncommon editorial want—want of room, forbids us.

VICTORIA, or the World Overcome. By CAROLINE CHESEBRO'. Author of "Isa, a Pilgrimage," &c.

We lately had occasion to notice favorably the "Philly and Kit" of Miss Chesebro'. Her present work demands at least as much encomium and more space to do it justice, inasmuch as it is a sustained effort of considerable magnitude. Miss Chesebro' is one of the ablest writers who have adopted what may be termed the psychological phases of humanity as fitting subjects for the illustration of their pens. She is bold, graphic, and often picturesque in her style. An earnestness of no common order seems to inspire her; and though many of her readers, through the unfortunate taste of the day for something electric, may not follow her patiently through the rather ambitious metaphysical detailsshe indulges in, still they must—in the broad views and subtle distinctions given, find much to attract, if not to draw from them the hearty approval which more thoughtful people will freely and appreciatively accord.

Where to Go.

The "Brewers" should to "Malta" go,
The "Boobies" all to "Scilly;"
The "Quakers" to the "Friendly" Isles,
The "Furriers" to "Chili;"
The little snarling, carolling "babes"
That break our nightly rest,
Should be packed off to "Baby"-lon,
To "Lap"-land or to "Brest;"
From "Spit"-head "Cooks" go o'er to Greece,"
And while the "Miser" waits
His passage to the "Guinea" coast,
"Spendthrifts" are in the "Straits."
"Spinsters" should to "Needles" go,
"Wine-bibbers" to "Burgundy;"
"Gourmands" should lunch at "Sandwich" Isles,
"Wags" at the Bay of "Fun"-dy;
"Bachelors" flee to the "United States,"
"Maids" to the Isle of "Man;"
Let "Gard'ners" go to "Botany" Bay,
And "Shoe-blacks" to "Japan."
Thus emigrate, and mis-placed men
Will then no longer vex us,
And all who ain't provided for
Had better go to Texas.

Major Crawley, so long and favorably known as conductor of the Military Argus of this City, has associated with him in the proprietory department Mr. Henry C. Goodwin, Paper Merchant, of New-York. We believe that arrangements are being made to strengthen the editorial corps of the Argus, the price in future of which will be three cents per number, or one and a-half dollars per annum. Mr. W. B. Smith will continue to superinted the typographical department, in which there is great improvement.

The Nation informs us that a young Limerick artist, who will yet be a great painter, has just completed a marvellous portrait —the portrait of William Carleton. It is one of the most striking and boldly-handled subjects we have seen for many a day—vigorous, vivid, subtle, and finely toned. The massive Celtic head, with its towering dome, crested with a light wreath of silvery hair—the deep blue eyes, with their curious keen glow, musing over some fair creation—the large features, so heavy yet so flexible, and so full of various expression, from the most gloomy passion to the most frolicksome fun of that Irish character which he has painted so powerfully because he represents it so perfectly—all look like life itself from the canvas—not in the least idealized, caught, just as they are, real and breathing, in some happy moment, and conveyed to the canvas for ever. The author sits in a musing mood. Some memory of a peasant festival in ancient Clogher is haply flitting through his brain, soon to be transferred in colors as vivid and longer-lived than the artist's, to the pages that lie beside him. The hand, a singularly fine and plastic one for a figure of such massive mould, is a portrait in itself. The fine oval outlines of the brow are most perfectly displayed. It was hard to paint a mouth whose power is mainly its extraordinary mobility of expression—but Mr. Slattery has transferred to it the same dreary air of thought that there is in the eye. We venture to predict that this young artist—he is almost a boy—will do great things yet. He has a most perfect perception of his art, and a highly accomplished skill in its execution. His portraits are the most real that can be conceived; but with a difference from that flat accuracy of the photograph, which we are becoming too accustomed to. One of George Petrie's venerable and amiable heads is almost equal to Carleton'sfor its wonderful truthfulness and spirit. We noticed some of his pictures in the recent Exhibition of the Hibernian Academy, and we heartily hope he may be encouraged to remina in Ireland by a success which he richly deserves.

The Liverpool Daily Times, in its report of the inquest on Mr. John Fagan, bookseller, one of the persons who lost their lives in the fatal fire in Shaw's-alley, Liverpool, has the following remarks on his melancholy fate: "Poor Fagan! he deserved a better fate. He was, perhaps, one of the most extraordinary men in his way of the present age. He was allowed, on all hands, to be the best judge of the value of ancient, classical, and other works; and there was hardly a work of any note turned from the press since printing was invented, that he had not a catalogue of in his head, and if the work was to be had in Europe, he could tell where, and in what library. He was formerly in extensive trade in Dublin, where he was well known and much esteemed. He was one of the first oral story-tellers that could be found, and many of Lever's and Carleton's best stories were furnished—the groundwork and foundation—by poor John Fagan, to both these authors. He was rich in rare anecdotes, and all who knew him valued him for his honest and straightforward dealings, his natural humor and abilities. Some rich sketches, written by him, have appeared from time to time in the periodicals; and had his circumstances been of an easier description, so as to allow him to devote more of his time and genius to literature, he would have been a remarkable man.

The Manchester Guardian says:—The mansion at the upper end of Moseley street, for so many years past the residence of the late William Grant and Daniel Grant, the originals of Dickens' "Cheeryble Brothers," was almost the last private residence in that street. Dwelling after dwelling has disappeared, warehouses have risen on their sites, and now the "town-house" of the Grants is empty and desolate. The furniture has been removed, and the house is closed to give place to another palatial pile for storing the staple goods of Manchester. The walls within which the jovial laugh of the owner and his friends has rung so often, now echo no cheering sound; the hearth which so long and often glowed with the warmth of a generous hospitality, is cold and deserted; with its kind and generous owners the spirit of the old house has departed; and like their own clay tenements, it will soon be but dust and ashes.

Schiller's eldest son, by his marriage with Charlotte de Lengefield, of Rudolfstadt, still lives in Wurtemburg, and holds the functions of a royal forester. He has one son only, who is in the Austrian military service, and is the sole heir to the illustrious name of his grandfather, whose second son died some years past, while Councillor of Regency at Treves. Caroline the eldest daughter settled at Rudolfstadt, near her mother's family; established a boarding-school for girls, and married a councillor of mines, named Junot. She removed subsequently to, and died at Wurzburg. The younger sister, Emily, who has the reputation of inheriting much of her father's talent and character, married a Baron de Gleichen, who possessed property at Rudolfstadt and in Bavaria. They had a son, still living, to whom King Louis of Bavaria stood sponsor. Consequently, of Schiller's posterity there are now surviving, his eldest son, Charles, his youngest daughter, Emily, and grandsons, Frederick and Louis.

The late Baron Sina, a native of Greece, and of humble extraction, has left 1,000,000 of drachms (at 10s. a piece) to his fatherland, to be expended in the following manner: 540,000 drachms to be spent in the erection of a building for the Academy of Athens, the plans of which have been already made by M. T. Hansen of Vienna, the architect who erected the Otto University and the Observatory in the Greek capital; 200,000 drachms are to be capitalized to increase the salaries of the professors at the academy; 60,000 drachms for the completion of the cathedral of Athens.

Thomas Hastings has issued a collection of Psalm and hymn tunes, anthems, charts, etc., adapted to the use of classes and churches. Many of the tunes are original, and said to be good.

G. P. R. James, now of Richmond, Va., is engaged upon the concluding chapters of a new romance.

It has been stated that M. Horace Vernet was working at a picture of the taking of the Malakoff, but it is not generally known that this picture is ordered by the town of Autun, the native place of General McMahon.

Several large pictures of Mr. Rositer, the well-known historical painter, are missing. They were last heard from at Mobile, in April last, where they were being exhibited by Mr. Charles R. Wilbur. Mr. Rossiter fears that Mr. Wilbur may have died, and that the pictures may have got lost.

The Literary Gazette says, the first book ever printed in the New World was in the city of Mexico. It was printed in the Spanish language, in the year 1544, and was entitled "Doctrina Christiana per eo los Indos." The first publication made in English, in America, was the "Freeman's Oath," an Almanac for 1639, nearly a hundred years after the work published in Mexico.

John G. Sake, poet and wit, is completely prostrated by another attack of paralysis, and fears as to his total recovery are entertained.

The first copyright issued under the new protective authors' bill, in Philadelphia, was issued to Thomas H. Elliot, Esq., for a five act comedy, entitled "Law and Fashion." The author is attached to the Ledger office.

Porter's "Spirit of the Times" is fourth proof.

MAYOR WOOD.

NEW YORK, Sept. 22, 1856.

To the Editor of the Irish News:

MY DEAR MEAGHER:—Knowing that you have a settled aversion—perhaps a very just one—to city politics, or any discussion tending to bring you into collision, even incidentally, with politicians or journalists, I would not ask any portion of your space if I did not feel bound to defend the present Mayor of New-York against what I consider to be a very great injustice and a grievous wrong.

I make no comparison between him and any rival candidate that is or may be. Nor do I deprecate the hostility of individuals, or the fair ambition of any person desirous to supplant him. My objection is to the character and manner of the opposition which has been given and is threatened.

When Fernando Wood received the nomination of both wings of the Democracy last time, he was assailed more savagely than any person who, in my experience at least, aspired to a public position. There is scarcely a foul crime on record that was not imputed to him; "arson," "perjury," "robbery," and an interminable list of minor but no less degrading offences. A looker-on like myself, not acquainted with Mr. Wood's previous character, must conclude that he either was the most arrant villain or the most injured man in the community. If the former, he deserved no man's suffrage; if the latter, he was entitled to support from every honest man, merely because so much obloquy had been heaped upon him unjustly. This was precisely the consideration which influenced myself among others.

Of the personal charges I could see no satisfactory proof. A political one of grave moment was finally advanced. It was whispered, at first, then bayed and brayed aloud, that he was a "Hindoo"—a member of the highest grade. Here is an accusation, thought I to myself, which can be either proved or disproved. I did not know Mr. Wood at the time, never saw him, and had no sympathy whatever with him except what was created by the savageness of the attacks upon him.

I waited on him and obtained from him a distinct and emphatic denial of the charge, which was published at my request in the Tribune. Then came blank affidavits and anonymous letters in abundance. I was myself assailed. I replied, vindicating my course, and denying that those anonymous documents were any proof whatever.

Two gentlemen called on me at my office—men of highly respectable appearance and address—with blank affidavits, which they offered to swear to in my presence, but without giving their names. The affidavits stated that they were members of the same lodge with Mr. Wood. I told them that having taken an oath of secrecy to the lodge, and thus violated that secrecy, they need not add the mockery of another oath.

The bitterness of the attacks on his private character continued unabated up to the eve of the election. Yet he was elected, to the astonishment and utter discomfiture of those who pursued him with such inveterate hate. There came a lull, a suspension of hostility, with a view of gathering a storm of wrath wherewith to overwhelm his first official act. That storm never burst. In a very short time after he entered on his duties he wrung from his assailants a reluctant admission that he brought to the discharge of his duties high ability, firmness, energy and earnestness. He has never forfeited his title to these lofty qualities. He has never done one act that would give color to the charge of "Know-Nothingism." I can attest, myself, that in his appointments, in his judicial investigations and decisions, he has never distinguished between a native and a foreign-born citizen.

At the time the charge was first made, the excuse for not proving it was the oath of secrecy of the Order. That oath has been since abolished; the Mayor did some things—many things distasteful to the Order, and not one tittle of proof has been offered. I think it highly improper and unjust to unbury this charge after it was disposed of by the suffrages of the people. It is not the less unjust, but it is the more preposterous, that the result of now urging it may be, nay almost inevitably will be, the return of an undoubted, downright Hindoo, of whose principles those who advanced it have such a horror.

The question now is, not what Society the Mayor may have belonged to, or what were his private transactions years ago, but how has he discharged the duties of his office? Has he been faithful, laborious, diligent, just? Has he been impartial, disinterested and honest in all things and between all men? Has he been accessible alike to poor and rich, been unbending alike to rich and poor? Has he been prompt, bold and resolute in checking corruption and urging reform? If these questions must be all answered in the affirmative, as I affirm they must, then is his claim unimpeachable. In answer to any charge, he can confidently point to his acts. There they stand, living, unerring, irreproachable testimony.

Although I have much more to say on this subject, feeling that I have already sufficiently trespassed, I here close.

Yours sincerely, MICHAEL DOHENY.

MISS KATE O'SULLIVAN OF ALBANY.

We deeply and sincerely sympathize with the afflicted parents and numerous friends of the above named estimable and talented young lady, of whose untimely fate and funeral obsequies we now annex some particulars, taken from the local press, which, we regret, escaped our notice last week:

"Miss O'Sullivan was driving, with the wife and daughter of Mr. Myers, and while in the vicinity of Freeman's bridge, the horse took affright, and becoming unmanageable, backed down the embankment into the canal. The two ladies who were with Miss O'S. jumped from the carriage, but she remained in, endeavoring to manage the animal. Unfortunately, no one was present but the two ladies and a man—or rather the image of one. The ladies entreated him to save the drowning girl, but he saw the unfortunate young lady sink to a watery grave without manifesting any desire to save her life.

"The screams of Miss O'S. reached the ears of a young man, James Keeher, who ran to the scene and plunged into the water, dove down and brought up the body. Life was extinct. Every effort was made to resuscitate her, but all in vain.

"Not the least strange feature of this affair, is, that Miss O'Sullivan had recently expressed the opinion that she would meet with a sudden death, and requested her friends to wear evergreens at her burial.

She was a very excellent young lady, beloved by all her acquaintances for her noble qualities of mind and heart, and endeared to many warm friends in the musical circles of the city, of which she was a bright ornament.—Atlas.

The Cathedral was crowded yesterday morning, with the thousands who attended the funeral service of Miss Kate O'Sullivan, and vast crowds surrounded the church, unable to gain admittance. The character and accomplishments of the deceased, and the suddenness and painful manner of her death, excited a universal sympathy, which was not limited to any creed or race.

A solemn Requiem Mass was celebrated by the pastor of the Cathedral parish, the Rev. Mr. Wadham, assisted by Mr. Brady, of St. Mary's, and others. The Rev. Mr. Conroy, of St. Joseph's, and others, were also present and participants. The Mass for the dead commences with the Requiem eternam dona eis, Domine, &c., and includes the solemn and terrible hymn, the Dies Iræ; and the sublime passage of the Apocalypse of St. John, when he proclaims that he heard the celestial voice telling him: "Write, happy the dead who die in the Lord. Henceforth, saith the Holy Spirit, they rest from their labors, for their works accompany them, and follow after them."

The beautiful music of the service was rendered by the Cathedral Choir, under the direction of Mr. Carmody, who were assisted by members of the Choirs of St. Joseph and the Holy Cross. The pastor of the latter church, Rev. Mr. Nœthan, sang, as did Mr. Cherberliez, of the Episcopal Church of St. Paul's, who was a brief while the musical instructor of the deceased. Her late companions of the choir were altogether too much overcome by emotions to trust themselves alone with this solemn service; and the young voice that sang the Sister Angels, trembled with sympathy, though it lost none of its sweetness or power.

The Bishop preached the funeral service—the first he had preached since his residence in Albany. It was eloquent and affecting; and he spoke of the virtues of the deceased and her sudden death, with touching force—of her simplicity and goodness, her bright and happy youthfulness of soul, her piety, her consecration of her voice to God (for she never used her gift of song except in the service of religion), and her charity and benevolence—and he enforced the lesson of human mortality and the instability of life with the solemn admonitions of religion.

After the ceremonies of the church had closed, the coffin was borne off from the Cathedral by the funeral cortege, to the tomb.

The Y. M. Catholic Institute attached to the Cathedral, the Y. M. Literary Societies of St. John's Church, and also of St. Mary's, were present with badges, as was the St. John's Society of Schenectady, and they all accompanied the procession.—Argus.

The military authorities are energetically at work putting the fortifications of Quebec into repair. The Quebec Mercury says: "There is hardly a point at which the fortifications are not being repaired or improved. A new and very strong block house is making below the flag-staff, and very extensive works, of by no means ancient construction, above that point, have been condemned, and are now rebuilding in a more formidable manner, near where a battery and draw-bridge have been constructed.

The Mayor of Richmond (Va.) has decided that night serenades are unlawful.

Engagements have been offered, with every prospect of success, to several American artists of renowned fame, and to others of dawning distinction, whose genius it will be the object of the management to cultivate and encourage, and several comedies, written in this country and for this theatre, will be produced.

The stage, in all its departments, will be under the exclusive direction and control of Mr. Lester.

It will be the endeavor of the management to merit for this theatre during the season the same success with which it has been hitherto crowned, and to maintain the pre-eminence accorded to it by the American public. sept27

Inauguration of the Franklin Statue.

The inauguration of the statue of Franklin, in Boston, on the 17th instant, was a grand affair, surpassing in some of its more imposing details, the great civic event of introducing Cochituate water. The procession, embracing nine divisions, was over two hours in passing a given point, and represented nearly every mechanical trade and manufacture. Among the special attractions was a new and beautiful locomotive and tender, named Benjamin Franklin, drawn by eighteen horses; a sugar grinding mill for Cuba, drawn by twelve horses; the House and Morse telegraph instruments; the electric fire-alarm; Franklin's old printing press, on which was being struck off and scattered to the crowd a fac simile of his newspaper, dated 1723; immense structures on wheels, representing school rooms filled with scholars at the desks, and a vast number of other novel and interesting features, made up one of the grandest displays ever witnessed. The Masonic fraternity, Fireman's and Mechanics' Charitable Associations, and numerous other charitable societies from the adjoining cities and towns, were out in full force. Also, the Franklin medal scholars, children of the public schools, &c. The procession reached the site of the statue, at the west front of the City Hall, soon after three o'clock. Here several thousands took possession of the temporary seats and platform, while other thousands filled every standing place in the vicinity. The drapery which had hitherto concealed the statue was then raised, when it was greeted with thunders of applause. The oration was pronounced by the Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, and occupied an hour and a quarter in its delivery. It was listened to with close attention. The hymn of "Old Hundred" was sung by the vast audience, and a benediction by Bishop Eastburn closed the inauguration. The number of strangers and citizens that thronged to witness the pageant was greater than ever before seen in the city. During the oration and the exercises, telegraphic messages were transmitted to, and answers received and read from, the Mayors of Portland, New York, Philadelphia, Halifax, Troy, Albany, Springfield, Dover, Pittsfield and other cities. In the evening the City Hall was brilliantly illuminated.

There was a great democratic celebration in honor of the anniversary of the adoption of the federal constitution in Philadelphia, on the 17th instant. The meeting was called to order at two o'clock, when George M. Wharton was called on to preside. He delivered an eloquent speech. A series of resolutions appropriate to the occasion were adopted, and Governor Johnston, of Georgia, made a speech of two hours, giving the history of the federal constitution, and declaring its most important feature to be the equality given to every state in the Union. Speeches followed by Gov. Floyd, of Virginia, and Hon. Howell Cobb, of Georgia, at the main stand, and by Mr. Biddle, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Moore, of Texas, at the Southern stand. At eight o'clock the procession formed on Arch street, headed by the Keystone Club, with a huge bell mounted on a wagon, placarded "We are tolling the knell of black republicanism." Following the Keystones came large delegations from the cities of New York, Trenton and Beverley, New Jersey, and Montgomery and Delaware counties. Following these came the various city wards, accompanied with bands of music, and innumerable torches and banners of every description. The procession was a most imposing affair, and the streets through which it passed were blazing with lights.

The Louisville Journal gives the following particulars of a tragical affair that occurred in Bullitt county, Kentucky, a few days since. Two brothers, named Jerry and Thomas Jones, had married sisters, whose maiden name was Burdett, and lived neighbors. On one or more occasions Jerry had made improper overtures to Thomas' wife, and it is said threatened her life once in case of refusal. She then persuaded him to desist until some other time. In the meantime the woman had prepared a five-shooter, so as to be prepared for Jerry should he again attempt anything of the kind. A few days ago Jerry went to his brother's house and renewed his propositions. The woman threw him off his guard by pretending to comply with his request, and while he had his back turned toward her, she drew the pistol and shot at him three times, hitting him every time, and killing him immediately. Mrs. Jones was tried and acquitted.

Governor Seymour is stumping all parts of the State. He is untiring in his exertions, and his blows fall heavily upon the enemy. In conversation he says that he has never noticed a greater change in public sentiment than that which has taken place within the past few weeks—the result of which has added vastly to Mr. Buchanan's strength. He is gaining on the other candidates every day; and the more sanguine Democrats no longer doubt that this great State will cast her vote for him in November.

Mr. Henrietta Harden died in St. Mary's County, Maryland, on the 29th ult., having attained the rarely precedented age of 118 years. The Leonardtown Beacon says she was the widow of a revolutionary soldier, and as such applied for a bounty land-warrant under the Act of Congress; but, owing to the loss or destruction of marriage records of that early period, and the fact that there was no other person living in the county old enough to bear testimony to such a fact, the old lady was unsuccessful in her application to prove her marriage.

About a century ago, Benjamin Franklin, the Postmaster-General of the American colonies by appointment of the crown, made his official inspection of the principal routes in his gig; and when holding the same office under the authority of Congress, a small folio, containing three quires of paper, lasted as his account book for two years. Now it would require six years of incessant traveling, at the rate of 125 miles daily, to pass over the routes; while the post-office accounts consume every two years, 3,000 of the largest sized ledgers, keeping 100 clerks constantly occupied in recording transactions, with 30,000 contractors and others.

From a confession made by a rogue now in jail at Hartford, Conn., it appears that one of the gang with whom he was connected traveled through various towns selling polishing powders, with a view of ascertaining where silver plate was to be found. In visiting dwellings he was always quite bold in following the inmates to adjacent rooms, to test his powders on silver spoons and plate. He made a memorandum of what he saw, in a book, noting particularly those houses where a dog was kept.

It is stated that visitors still continue to make their pilgrimage to the sepulchre of Mr. Webster, scarcely a day passing without a record of new names in the register kept at the mansion. The register was opened in July, 1853, the Hon. Edward Everett heading the list, which now numbers from three to four thousand names of persons from all portions of the world.

Hon. Bronson Murray, in a letter to the Prairie Farmer, published at Chicago, Ill., proposes to be one of a hundred subscribers to a fund of $50,000, to be awarded as a premium for a perfected steam plough suited to farm use, and capable of performing the work at an expense in money not greater than the average cost of performing the same work under the present system.

An Albany editor says that a mouse which had several times been caught in the act of nibbling the nice things in his pantry, was the other day traced to its nest, which was found to contain seven or eight cunning little "responsibilities." The parent rogue was arrested and executed for larceny. On one side of the nest was found a piece of an old Bible on which the following words were distinctly visible: "Thou shalt not steal." What a hypocrite!

The editor of the Evening Mirror gives a specimen of hyperbolic nonsense as follows: "Brother Enoch Stephens, a Know-Nothing, in a speech welcoming Hon. Thomas R. Whitney home from Washington, the other evening, hifalutinized as follows: 'We have had our Henry Clay [cheers]; we have had our Daniel Webster [silence]; we have had our John C. Calhoun [symptoms of discontent]; but none of them can compare with our own beloved Thomas R. Whitney'" [Deafening applause and waving of colors].

We have rumors from Mexico, by way of Havana, that a serious difficulty has occurred between that country and Great Britain, though the nature of the difficulty is not mentioned. It is stated that the British Minister had demanded his passports, and that orders had been transmitted to Havana, for the British squadron there to proceed to Vera Cruz to enforce the demands of England.

The Albany (Ga.) Patriot of the 28th ult., says the crops of corn, although not probably so good, generally, as last year, are still abundant, and need only to be carefully saved to insure plenty. The cotton crop is, we understand, improving in appearance, and yielding better than was expected.

A rumor reached New Orleans, says the Bulletin, that Mr. A. M. Foley, wife and two servants, had been found alive on an island two miles from Last Island, and taken to the house of Mr. Brashear. According to the statement, they had subsisted on crabs for two weeks.

We hear very disastrous accounts of the destruction of the coming crops in this vicinity, says the Natchez Courier of the 18th ult., by the storms of last week. The cotton on many plantations has been entirely prostrated. One-fourth—one-third—nay, one-half, is freely spoken of as the amount of injury.

The imports of silk have risen in value since 1847 from less than $12,000,000 to over $24,000,000, and the customs from £1,834,850 to $6,129,583. In these nine years the total amount of duties received into the Treasury from manufactures of silk is $51,893,871, while the total revenue from iron, manufactures of iron, and iron and steel, amounted to only $50,139,942.

A respectable old citizen writes to the Savannah News that he once boarded and studied French "with Monsieur Fremont, the sire of the Black Republican candidate for the Presidency, in Savannah, in Gibbons' old building, (brick), where his Honor J. C. Fremont first saw the light.

On Sunday, the 21st ult., says the Petersburg Express, when the Wilmington and Weldon cars passed through Goldsboro', the snow was falling quite as thickly and as prettily as it ever fell in those parts during winter.

On Monday, 15th, Michael Alton, an Irish plasterer, was suddenly struck with paralysis, in Cincinnati, and died in a few moments.

Red River has become impassable, says the Natchitoches Chronicle, for any class of steamboats, above the falls. The whole travel of our section is now carried on by stages.

CONSUMPTION!

FOR the treatment of Consumption. Of all diseases to which the Human constitution is liable, there is none which so pre-eminently claims the attention of the public and the Faculty, as that melancholy affection, popularly known as

CONSUMPTION.

The evil is so universally prevalent, that scarcely an individual can be found who is not more or less affected by its ravages, either in his own person or hereditarily, his nearest relations or friends. The spirit of inquiry upon this subject, however, as upon almost all others of human interest, have recently become aroused, and the question is eagerly asked by those who have seen the dearest object of their heart's best worship snatched away in the Spring-time and bloom of life, by the fell destroyer, Consumption,

WHY CANNOT CONSUMPTION BE CURED?

What is there in this disease more than any other, that so effectually eludes scientific investigation, and withstands the operation of Remedial Agents? Why is it that the Lungs cannot be treated successfully when diseased, as well as other parts of the human system? If we study the natural philosophy of man, and the goodness of the Creator right, we shall discover that there is in the great Materia Medica of Nature, a Remedy for every Disease to which the human frame is subject. CONSUMPTION is a simple disease, and, in its incipient stages, is as easily cured as many other diseases, in the successful treatment of which not the slightest difficulty or uncertainty exists, but in its advanced state, when it has obtained a firm grasp upon the vital energies, and paralyzed, as it were, all the healthful organs of the system, it then presents a more formidable aspect; it is obvious, therefore, how important it is that the physician should be well informed of the stage of the disease before he prescribes for its cure.

How ignorant, cruel and mercenary is the system of Quackery, which consists in the sale of Patent Medicine to cure CONSUMPTION. Some individuals, by reason of a deficiency of moral courage, blind themselves to their real condition by refusing to recognize the well-marked symptoms of the disease, while others in complaining are subject to ridicule, from their blooming cheeks and other signs of health, and thus the disease progresses to an advanced stage before medical aid is sought to check its fatal effects.

A synopsis of the symptoms of the first great cause of CONSUMPTION is hereto subjoined. Apparently trivial irritation of the throat, and internal membranes, produced by a cold. It is almost universally disregarded. This irritation becomes seated, and the lungs reduced to a confirmed state of unnatural expectoration, and eventually inducing inflammation there, which rapidly conducts the patient step by step through the different stages, until he becomes a victim to

PULMONARY CONSUMPTION.

During the first three or four weeks of his cough, it is usually slight, and occurs chiefly in the morning. This is usually regarded by the patient as of little consequence, and no idea is entertained that his cough in the slightest degree endangers the lungs, especially as it is attended with no apparent expectoration.

THIS IS THE FIRST FATAL ERROR.

This state of things lasts for months without exciting serious alarm; by degrees, however, the cough increases, and is particularly troublesome after any sudden exertion, such, for instance, as running rapidly up stairs, violent conversation or laughter. The cough begins now to be accompanied with the expectoration of a transparent frothy fluid, resembling saliva, and sometimes mixed with blood. As the disease advances, the cough increases without any exciting cause; the rest is broken by it, and in the day-time it is frequently accompanied by pains in the chest, and even vomiting; in females there is a suppression of the monthly period, and as the disease progresses, hectic fever, night sweats, diarrhœa, and swelling of the lower extremities, ensue.

ELI W. VONDERSMITH, M. D., wishes the public distinctly to understand that he is a regularly educated Physician, having graduated at the New-York University, and his great success in curing Consumption has arisen solely from the circumstance of his having devoted his time entirely to the treatment of diseases of the Chest and Lungs during the last twelve years. More than five hundred persons in this city have been under his care, and can be referred to as entirely cured by his treatment. In the treatment of this disease, no mercury, opium, nor any mineral substances in any form whatever are used. He would also add, for the information of those living in other cities or in the country, who are unable to visit New-York, that he can be consulted by letter giving a full and careful description of their case, and enclosing one dollar.

Their Book Trade.

The old established house of Benziger Brothers, Eisiedeln, well known to many of the Hierarchy and the Rev. Clergy of the United States who have visited Switzerland, established this house in New-York four years ago, and they trust they will receive for the greatly increased advantages they offer, a continuance of that support, which for a period of over forty years has enabled them to build up, at the Pilgrimage of Our Lady of the Hermits (Einsiedeln) an establishment in which over four hundred persons are daily employed in the fabrication of the various articles that are used in the Church.

They desire particularly to call attention to their publications of PRAYER and DEVOTIONAL BOOKS, in German, French, Italian and Latin, consisting of over 200 different sorts. Being in immediate and constant intercourse with nearly all the principal publishers of Europe, they are enabled to offer a large assortment of standard THEOLOGICAL and LITURGICAL WORKS, among which are, the editions of Mechline, Paris, Ratisbone, &c., at exceedingly low prices.

They are also prepared to supply any of the English Catholic Books published in the United States, at publishers' lowest prices.

An assortment of Dutch and Flemish Prayer Books, and of German School and Story Books.

2. They very respectfully invite an inspection of their extensive assortment of

Vestments and Church Vessels,

and, in doing so, feel confident that their stocks is more varied and of superior fabrication than any of the kind heretofore introduced into the United States, and from their facilities for purchasing in Europe, are enabled to sell at a lower price than any other house in the country.

Contemplate the Life of Mary!

EDWARD DUNIGAN & BROTHER,

151 Fulton street, New-York,

Are now publishing in semi-monthly parts at 25 cents each and under the express approbation of the

MOST REV. JOHN HUGHES, D.D.,

Archbishop of New-York,

The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary,

OF HER MOST CHASTE SPOUSE

St. Joseph,

AND HOLY PARENTS

St. Joachim and St. Anne.

Illustrated by fine Steel Engravings, and printed on superfine paper, with Chapter Headings, Borders, and Initial Letters, designed and engraved expressly for this work.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, is by the Rt. Rev. Romuald Gentilucci, Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., is dedicated to and honored with the suffrages of His Holiness, and approved by the Master of the Sacred Palace.

Gentilucci's work will ever be remarkable for its unction and beauty of style, no less than for the deep knowledge which it displays of the writings of the Holy Fathers, and all the monuments of ecclesiastical history that can, in any way throw light on the Life of the Immaculate Mother of Our Lord, as handed down in the loving tradition of the faithful from the age in which she lived.

The Life of Saint Joseph—no unfit companion for the elegant work of Gentilucci—is from the pen of Father Vallejo, a Mexican Jesuit of the last century, a work approved by the ecclesiastical authorities in the Roman States, and frequently reprinted.

CONDITIONS.

The Life of the Blessed Virgin, Her Holy Spouse and Parents, will be published in semi-monthly parts of 48 pages each, with a Steel Engraving and several Wood Cuts in each number, and will, when complete, form a volume of nearly 1000 pages.

OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRESS.

The work having received the approbation of His Holiness, himself, as well as of the illustrious Archbishop Hughes, it only remains for us to say, that it appears to be gracefully translated into our language, and the style in which it is produced, is really superior, both as to its general appearance, as well as to the chasteness of the design, and execution of the illuminated borders which adorn every page of the work.—London Register and Catholic Standard.

No other work of our day on the same subject can be compared to it. It is unrivalled for beauty of style and depth of erudition. It is the offering of the learned and devoted son of the Blessed Virgin, who enjoys the confidence and friendship of our most holy Father, to whom the work is dedicated. We are no more edified at the piety of the author, than astonished at the wonderful erudition displayed in this book. The translator has performed his task admirably. Pittsburg Catholic.

We cannot too highly recommend it to the consideration of our readers whether we regard the intrinsic value of the work, itself, or the beauty and exquisite ensemble of its getting up.—Truth Teller.

Profusely illustrated with engravings and vignettes, this work is brought out in such an elegant style, as to make it, exclusive of its literary merit, a fitting library companion to the magnificent edition of the Bible of the enterprising publishers.—Detroit Vindicator.

The work is one of devotion and merit. We do not know who translated it, but it seems better than average translations.—Freeman's Journal.

The work translated from the Italian, and apparently well translated, is by an eminent author, is dedicated by permission to his Holiness Pius IX., and is spoken of in very high terms by competent judges. As far as we have seen it, we like it very much, and think it must prove a great favorite with the children of Mary and all devout Catholics.—Brownson's Review.

The ships of this line are the largest and swiftest in the trade, their accommodations for passengers are unequalled, and the frequency and punctuality of their departure offer advantages to the emigrant not to be had by any Line of Packets. Such passengers as decline coming out, the money paid for them will be promptly refunded without discount.

Provisions of best quality are provided for passengers; rations, consisting of Bread, Flour, Rice, Oatmeal, Tea, Sugar, Molasses, Salt, &c.

The increased patronage received by the proprietors of the Old Black Star Line has induced them to add to the Line several New Ships, which have taken their place this season; no expense has been spared to render the facilities for Emigration equal to the times, and add to the renown of these celebrated Packets.

The regular Sailing days are 1st, 8th, 11th, 18th, 21st, and 26th of each month; this will give passengers opportunity for embarking more frequent than by any other established Line, to which the attention of the public is respectfully called.

No Certificate of Passage will be issued for children under 12 years of age unless accompanied by an adult, who must be paid for on same certificate; or persons over 60 years of age, or with any impediment, without a Permit from Commissioners of Emigration.

NOTICE.—The recent failures, by which a large amount of Bills remitted from this country to friends in Ireland, has been returned unpaid, afford to this Society the opportunity, and at the same time impose upon it the duty of informing the public, that such losses would have been prevented if the parties purchasing Bills had availed themselves of the advantages offered by the Society.

FOREIGN SUMMARY.

By the Washington, (Southampton, 10th ult.) Kangaroo, (Liverpool, 10th ult.) and Canada, (Liverpool, 13th.)

Russia.—His Imperial Majesty, the Emperor Alexander II, was solemnly crowned at twelve o'clock, on the 7th. The ceremony took place in the Uspenski Ssobor, and the act of coronation was performed by Archbishop Philaretes, the Metropolitan of Moscow. Among the special ambassadors who were present, were Earl Granville, Prince Esterhazy, M. Castalborgone, and the representative of the Sultan. The proceedings had all that august appearance which immense preparations had designed. An immense crowd assembled at the Kremlin Palace and in the streets, and very great enthusiasm was everywhere manifested. The ringing of the bells, the firing of cannon, the parade of troops, the ceremonials of the Church, the procession to the Palace, and the decorations of the city, rendered the whole affair most inspiriting. The coronation was favored by beautiful weather. Count Orloff was created a Prince, Prince Woronzoff a Field Marshal, and Generals de Berg and Soumarokhoff Counts. The Continental papers profess to give the substance of the amnesty to be granted, as follows :—First. That the Maritime Provinces shall be exempt from conscription for four years. Second. Amnesty for the events of 1825, 1827, and 1831, but the confiscation of property not removed. Third. Direct taxation to be regulated by a new census. It is reported that the Czar is about to effect a full understanding in religious matters with the Pope. A new edict removes all quarantine restrictions from Bessarabia, Black Sea and Sea of Azoff until the close of navigation for the present year.

England.—There is no political news of the least importance. The London Post (Government organ,) recommends the Hudson Bay Territory as a favorable seat for a convict establishment. Owing to the failure of the Royal British Bank having caused great uneasiness in England, the Governor of the Unity Bank issued a notification to the public, in which he stated that every depositor may have his money if he chooses to apply for it, and that the paid up capital of the Bank, £150,000, remains intact. The London Times has a leader on the suspension of the Royal British Bank. It considers that the Bank has broken in a most disgraceful manner. The Gloucester Musical Festival, the greatest English musical re-union, commenced on the 9th inst., and promised to be one of the most prosperous on record. The splendor of the weather has induced hundreds of persons to visit the ancient town. All the principal English and foreign solo singers are engaged.

France.—The scantiness of remarkable events which has characterized French politics for some time past, still prevails. The Emperor's sojourn at Biarritz, which was to end on the 10th of September, will be extended to the 1st of October. Commercial letters from Paris, state that business during the past week had been very quiet, and was generally without change. Parisian manufactures were dull of sale; but considerable activity was expected in all descriptions by the end of the month, or beginning of October. Numerous foreign and provincial buyers had arrived. At Rouen and Mulhouse, trade was dull. In the corn trade, the late enormous arrivals at Marseilles had caused holders to abate their pretensions, and prices were declining. The merchants of Marseilles having ascertained that the Wheat harvest will not be sufficient for the home consumption of all France, were beginning to suggest to the Government through their local papers, that the repeal of the corn laws would be indispensable, or at least an extension of the Imperial decree, which permits the free importation of corn, and which expires on the 1st January next. Although two millions of hectolitres of wheat had been imported within two months through the port of Marseilles, it would be impossible by the end of the year to make up the great deficiency which exists. It appears to be the common opinion in Paris that the French and English cabinets are at issue on several points, though no one supposes that these differences can essentially affect the alliance. The investment of General O Donnell with the grand cordon of the Legion of Honor, and the marked attention paid to Count Morny by the Emperor of Russia, are not likely to please the English Government. The English cabinet takes the same side as Turkey and Austria on the question of uniting the Danubian Principalities. The French Government is still undecided on this point. The Moniteur of the 7th inst., says that it being the anniversary of the capture of Sebastopol, the Emperor invited the 35th Regiment of the Line, which is stationed at Biarritz, to a dinner. The privates and subaltern officers were entertained in front of the barricades by the Emperor and Empress, who carried in her arms the Imperial Prince. The officers of the Regiment afterwards dined with their Majesties. Rumors are current that an exchange of Colonies is being negotiated between France and England, France to give up her factories on the main land of India, in Exchange for the Island of Mauritius. It is also reported that France wishes to purchase from Denmark a strip of the Coast of Iceland, for fishing stations. It is also further reported that the State of Algeria demands a large addition to the troops stationed there. A division of gunboats is to be sent to Senegal. The French exiles in the Basque Province are to be removed to Spain. The Moniteur continues the report from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, proposing various reforms in the Diplomatic service. The Emperor is still at Biarritz. On the 9th inst. he visited San Sebastian.

THE AFFAIR OF THE STUDENT'S CIRCULAR IN PARIS.

The Presse, the leading political journal of Paris, has just escaped suppression by extraordinary exertions. The correspondent of the Daily Times gives the following particulars :—Two weeks ago, this journal published an address from two hundred students of Paris, thanking such journals of this city as had espoused the cause of oppresed Italy. The Presse was among this number, as also the Siecle, the Estafette, and the Revue de Paris. The article which reproached the French government for its lukewarmness towards Italy was not signed by a responsible and veritable name, as the law of the press requires. It bore for signature the words, in parentheses, "Here follow 200 signatures." Immediately upon the publication of this document, the editors of the several journals mentioned were cited before the proper officer to be examined. The document containing the signatures was demanded. Neither of them had it. One of the editors declared he had seen it, but that he did not know then where it was to be found. All the offices were submitted to a strict search under the supervision of police-officers, but no document was found which contained the two hundred names, or any names at all. Without the production of the names, the journals in question would all have received a "warning," and as the Presse is already lying under two, the third one would have suppressed it. The Presse has a daily circulation of 40,000 ; the Siecle of 35,000 ; the Constitutionnel, 25,000 ; the Moniteur, 20,000 ; the Patrie, 15,000 ; the Pays and the Debats, 10,000 ; the Estafette, 9,000, and the Assemblee Nationale, 5,000. The Presse is the smallest in its amount of printed matter of all these, which are the principal journals of Paris, and its immense profit to its proprietor, M. Girardin, as well as its importance is thus seen. It is reasonable to suppose that the police, for an offence so apparently harmless, hesitated to strike a blow which should suppress the principal journal of the city, and at the same time effect so great a damage to the material interests of M. De Girardin. So they gave him time, and now we have the agreeable news that the signatures have been found, and that the suit against the journals has been withdrawn. The students have come forward and assumed the responsibility of the circular ; but whether they were hired to do so by M. De Girardin, or whether it was a spontaneous act on their part, the public, perhaps, will never know.

Spain.—There is no political news of note. With slight exceptions the country was tranquil, but the same uncertainty prevailed as to the future policy and fate of the O'Donnell ministry. The name of Narvaez is more often mentioned, and the probability of his succeeding the present men more openly discussed. M. Escalante has resigned his post at Washington, and his resignation has been accepted. A dispatch from Madrid, dated 10th, says the Queen has not yet come to any decision relative to the legation at Washington, or the appointment of the commander-in-chief of the halberdiers. It is now stated that the new constitution and organic law will be published on the 15th inst., but that the new elections will be postponed as long as possible. The report is current that sequestration is to be raised from the confiscated property of Queen Christina. The latest telegraphic dispatches from Spain contain nothing of peculiar interest. They state that the cabinet was unanimous, and possessed the entire confidence of the Queen. General Aleson has been named Commandant-General of the Philippine islands. The Madrid journals contain the official justification of the decree by which the Cortes was dissolved. The Ministers declare that this assembly has overstepped the limits of its powers, and that it has behaved regardless of the restrictions which were originally put upon its mandate by the decree of convocation.

Germany.—Frederick, Regent of Baden, who has been exercising the Government, in consequence of the mental imbecility of his elder brother, has assumed the sovereignty on his own account, as Grand Duke, preparatory to his marriage with the Princess of Prussia.

Prussia.—The celebrated trial respecting the stolen dispatches is terminated by the sentence of the accused police agent to a long term of imprisonment. Neufchatel affairs caused some diplomatic activity at Berlin.

Denmark.—Berlin letters of the 5th inst. say that in the question of the Sound Dues, France, adhering to the opinion pronounced by England, has pronounced in favor of the principle of purchase.

Sweden.—M. St. Jerneld, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has resigned. It is reported that the relations between Russia and Sweden are becoming more and more unfriendly.

Switzerland.—Prussia is said to have notified an inclination to give up her claims on Neufchatel in exchange for an indemnity, of which the European Powers shall fix the amount. France supports these views of Prussia. Prussia has lodged a protest with the Federal Government against any interference on its part with the affairs of Neufchatel. The State Council of Neufchatel reports that canton as quiet.

Austria.—The intervention of Austria in the contests between Prince Danilo and the Turks is more talked of. To the announcement of a display of military force on the Montenegrin frontier, which has been resolved upon at Vienna, we have now to add the assertion of a German paper, that instructions for an immediate diplomatic interference with the Sultan have been sent to the Austrian Ambassador at Constantinople.

Italy.—Vienna papers declare that the Western Powers have addressed a second note to Naples in the same spirit as the former, but in milder language. The Palma Gazette of the 9th inst. announces that the state of siege would be raised on the following day. The uncondemned prisoners were to be sent before the ordinary tribunals. Gen. Todleben was receiving a warm welcome in Sardinia.

India.—The dates from Calcutta are to August 9, and from Bombay to August 13. Oude is reported tranquil. The British are negotiating a treaty with the Momund chiefs, on the northwest frontier. The annual report of the trade of Calcutta, as compared with previous years, shows an improvement. The sugar crop of Mauritius is unprecedentedly large, amounting to 125,000 tuns. The cholera had ceased there.

China.—The latest dates from Hong Kong are to July 25, and from Singapore to August 2. The Chinese insurgents took possession of Tanyoang, July 6, which brings them close to Souchow, the capital of the province and outlet of commerce from Shanghae. An Imperial fleet of 40 sail is blockaded near Nankin. Telegraphic reports say that the American house of Wetmore & Co. had failed, but advices in London throw a doubt on the statement. The export of tea amounted to 428,000 tuns. The Cholera had ceased.

Australia.—Melbourne advices of June 14 are at Liverpool. The balance of trade continued in favor of the Colony. Agriculture and domestic manufacture were largely extending. The mines continued productive. From New-Zealand an encounter is reported between the British troops and the natives. Eighteen of the latter, it is said, were killed. A large amount of property at Wellington had been destroyed by fire. New discoveries of gold and copper were reported.

Foreign Miscellany.

According to the Allgemeine Zeitung there are 12,000 Jews in the Austrian army, of whom more than 500 are officers, surgeons with the rank of officers, and members of the auditing department.

Napoleon is reported to be desperately in love with two other persons, the Countess Castiglione, a Florentine of great wealth and beauty, and the celebrated Miss Neil, of England.

According to the Belgian papers, 500,000 quarts of beer were drank in the beershops of Brusssels during the late fetes. One of the latter, called Le Petit Paris, alone sold 20,000 quarts, and three pumps were kept working day and night.

The Friend of India estimates the number of converts to Christianity at probably one hundred thousand in India, and twenty thousand more in Ceylon.

THE SOUL'S PLEA FOR COLONIZING.

From the Toronto Mirror.

What the Pyramids are and were, after the people's notion of utility, to Egypt, the mass of rail and water communication will be to America in the world's history. Their ends, to shorten distance and widen commerce, will be fulfilled by other means more fully and less cumbrously ; and their traces, in levelled hills and the bridging of valleys, will remain for the amazement of generations yet unborn. On the crayon sketches of future antiquaries, the living tide of human life, at the rising of the sun, will gaze with wonder on our locks and depots ; our roads, canals, engines, boats, and bridges : they may aver that the hives are here ; but, as standing before the bulls and lions of Nineveh, we say now, so will they then,—"The busy bees—the workmen—where are they ? Of what were they ? How were they called ?"

After suggesting the danger that the Hiberno-Celtic builders of these canals and roads may share the fate of the Coptic Helots, who built the tomb of Pharaoh, the writer proceeds :

In the crowded, pestilent Babylons of this continent, and in the Sarcophagi which branch forth from them, nature refuses to bring forth tenants to maturity for the Mansions of the Just. The tiny infants, before they learn to lisp the name of father are cut off in hundreds by consumption ; thousands of adults descend to early graves with the same certificate of departure ; which is nothing more than a withering up of life's source, and a vitiating of pure generic blood in the putrid atmosphere and the tainted food of cities ; prompting, conjoined to magnetic influence of close proximity, to crime such as the deep chaste blue of the mountain sky would crimson to look upon. Absent from the rich soil which invites and repays in manly vigor the arm that tills it, the best citizen but half fulfils the command of of God : "In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat thy bread ;" and, in violation of the Divine mandate, dwindles even in the midst of harrowing care, below man's estate. The flaccid muscle, and the overwrought nervous system call for stimulants even to excess. In the midst of libidinousness and intoxication, a posterity is born literally "conceived in iniquities," which the moment that parental indifference or imbecility permits, runs riot in debauchery, to end beneath a tomb-stone. The wages of sin is death ; and such a death ! The last words a wail of despair, or the enunciation of that awful blasphemy—"Death is an eternal sleep ;" the last eulogy a lying paragraph in a public journal about the promising flower that was nipped in its bud ! Numbers, destined for the propagation of that noblest Hibernian type of human kind, never reach the years of manhood ; but thousands who may have boasted this doubtful fortune, rest beneath mausoleums, on which prematurely are engraved the glorious patronymics of our fatherland ; whose Irish blood would have coursed purely, freely, and holily in their veins, had pure, untainted food, and chaste localities been the data of existence.

Let those who may, then, flee the "cities of the plain" to the undulations of a land overflowing with milk and honey, in peace and productive labor : let them flee to a place where proud fashion and hollow parsimony will not dare invade the very nave of the Holy Church : let them build their family sepulchres where the sublime "Requiescat in pace" of our True Faith will not be the hypocrisy of Cant, and a graven insult before just Heaven. 'Tis the Soul's plea for Colonizing !

ROMANCE IN HUMBLE LIFE.

From the Syracuse Standard.

Most of our citizens are acquainted with Ann Gleason, a stout, healthy, good-natured Irish woman, who is frequently employed by merchants and owners of buildings to clean stores, public halls and private residences. Her work is generally of the most laborious description, but Ann is always cheerful, and in fact is a universal favorite.

Well, Ann has a husband, or at least she had one several years ago. He is a clever sort of a man, with very little energy, but lots of good nature. He was a peddler, and carried on his vocation in this neighborhood, making scarcely enough to keep his family from want.

About the commencement of the California excitement, Ann's husband started for the land of gold to better his fortune, leaving his wife and two children in this city. Ann received no tidings of him for several years, until finally some acquaintance happened to see the name of Gleason in the list of occupants of the Sing Sing Prison. Ann could scarcely believe that her husband had become a State Prison convict, but in order to be certain she scraped her little earnings together, and visited Sing Sing, where she soon found that the prisoner was not her husband, and returned to her solitary home with mingled feelings of joy and grief.

Soon afterward Ann was informed by a friend of her husband, who was with him in California, that Mr. Gleason had died in the mines, and the little he had gathered was all used to defray the expenses of his illness and funeral. This sad news dispelled all hope, and Ann relinquished the idea of ever seeing her husband again.

In the meantime she continued to labor, early and late, securing the good will of all who had occasion for her services, and she not only supported herself and children in comparative comfort, but had actually saved a nice little sum, which she was about investing in a small house and lot.

One day last week a gentleman of this city returned from California, and to Ann's utter astonishment and joy, informed her that her husband was alive and well in California, and had saved considerable money. He had frequently written to his wife, and sent her drafts for considerable amounts, and was surprised and alarmed at not hearing from her. She, poor soul, not dreaming that she had a friend in the world who would write to her, had never thought of calling for the letters, and consequently they had been sent to the Dead Letter office at Washington.

On learning that her husband was well, Ann lost no time in writing to him, and she also wrote to Washington to inquire about the money letters sent by her husband. In reply to her letter to Washington she has received a letter from the Department, intimating that letters and drafts are there, but requiring her to state the amount and number of drafts. This, of course, she cannot do ; and a full history of the case has been made out by her friends which has been properly certified and sent to the Department, with satisfactory references to persons residing in that city. It is presumed that this will be sufficient to warrant the authorities in sending her the letters and drafts from her husband.

The change in Ann's prospects has not "set her up" above work. We saw her yesterday afternoon busily engaged in cleaning the office of the Board of Education.

Irish News.

Saunders says that the arrival of the 5th regiment, in the garrison of Dublin, adds another to the illustrious roll of names whom it is proposed to honor. The 50th, bearing the designation of "The Queen's own," in addition to the attribute of "The Fighting Fiftieth"—to which its lengthened and heroic struggles in the Peninsular and other campaigns entitle it, is, although not strictly speaking an Irish regiment, composed, like very many others in her Majesty's service, to the extent at least of three-fourths of the sons of St. Patrick. In the great battles upon Crimean soil, although present, and on two occasions under fire, its loss was comparatively trifling. Sad havoc was, however, made in the ranks, both by trench-work and disease, and the brilliant episode of the 21st December, 1854, when 250 men of this devoted corps repulsed with immense loss an attack of 2,000 Russians, made with the object of retaking 'The Ovens, Saunders says, must for ever cast a halo around a name, which otherwise would be merely a unit in the phalanx alike distinguished for bravery and endurance. The spirited incident was at the time specially mentioned in Lord Raglan's despatch.

The Limerick Reporter says, that the Right Rev. Dr. Moriarty, Bishop of Kerry, in the exercise of his episcopal duty, denounced from the altar, in strong terms, a scandalous faction fight with which the streets of Tralee were disgraced on the 15th of August—a great holiday in the Catholic Church—and in doing so, his Lordship made some observations in reference to the Commissioned peace-preservers of the locality, which seem to have fired their indignation to an alarming extent. Occasion was taken at a subsequent meeting of Magistrates to comment on the language alleged to have been used by Dr. Moriarty. Mr. Shiel, the resident magistrate of Tralee, opened the matter in a speech of some length, in the course of which he read a correspondence between him and Dr. Moriarty. Mr. McGillicuddy, Mr. Quill, General Stokes, and Mr. Rae came to the support of Mr. Sheil. Dr. Moriarty deserves thanks at the hands of all dispassionate men for the bold and upright course he has taken.

The Carlow Sentinel is happy to learn that Major Butler, of the 20th Regiment, has arrived at Broomville, on a visit to his family, and in the enjoyment of good health. For his distinguished services during the war, Major Butler was awarded the Cross of the Legion of Honor. Major Shervington, of the 46th Regiment, who accompanied the expedition from Varna, and was present at the battle of Alma and Inkermann, has also arrived in Carlow, on a visit to his family, in excellent health. This gallant officer was Provost-Marshal at Sebastopol.

The crops in the neighborhood of Newport, County Limerick, are splendid. Corn of every kind is cutting every day. Laborers' hire is from 2s. 6d. to 3s. per day, and diet. The late rain has improved the potato crop very much; the earth is soft about them, and they are growing free from blight. All this good news we glean from the Limerick Reporter.

An attempt has been made to burn the Borrisokane Warehouse, by a pauper boy named Collins. It was discovered before much injury was done. Collins managed to secrete the fire in the school press, which was entirely consumed, together with about three pounds worth of school requisites.

An agent from the Great Atlantic Telegraph Company has visited Waterford, and inspected the noble quays of that city. He intimated that nothing was more certain than the formation of telegraphic communication between Ireland and America, by St. John's, Newfoundland.

Isaac Butt, M. P. for Youghal, has addressed a letter to the Dublin press, correcting an impression which prevailed, that the proposed Crimean banquet in Dublin, would be confined solely to the natives of Ireland. Mr. Butt refers to the resolutions, to show that the honor was intended to include all the Crimean soldiers now serving in Ireland.

A fine new dwelling house, not more than two years built, the property of Mr. Denis Madden, farmer, Cloncarree, near Morelands, County Limerick, has been burned to the ground, along with a hundred stone of wheat. Mr. Madden himself was badly burned, while attempting to put out the flames.

Captain Otway Wemys, 71st Light Infantry, has arrived at Danesfort, County Kilkenny, the residence of his father, Lieutenant-Colonel Wemys, Kilkenny Fusileers. Captain Wemys served throughout the entire of the Crimean war, including the taking of Kertch, with the regiment which distinguished itself so much, in common with the rest of the Highland Brigade, at Balaklava.

The increase of stock in the county Waterford has been considerable. The value of stock in Waterford in 1849 was £597,900; in 1854 it was £757,228; the increase being £159,328. Between 1853 and 1854 the increase in Leinster was 5.2 per cent.; in Munster 6.0 per cent.; in Ulster 4.2; and in Connaught 5.4. In the county Waterford the increase in the same period was 8.2.

The Leinster Express says, that in its advertising columns will be found a flattering address from the magistrates, gentry and merchants of Carlow Graigue, in the Queen's County, to Head Constable William Nicholls, on his transference from that station to Mountmellick; and adds, that it must be exceedingly gratifying to Mr. Nicholls to have his valuable services so handsomely appreciated.

An itinerant flute-player, named Thomas Byrne, while following his avocations in the streets of Maryborough, one night, a few weeks ago, received a slash of a reaping hook in the cheek, from a fellow called Edward Dunne, who resides at Roseleignin. Being brought before Mr. Cassan, Dunne was admitted to bail to take his trial at Petty Sessions.

The recent controversy between Mr. Marcus, the converted Jew, and the Rev. Mr. Drapes of proselytising notoriety, at Kilkenny, was unattended by a single PRIEST. The disputants were acrimonious. Mr. Drapes taunted Mr. Marcus with the Jews. Mr. M. responded that Mr. D. was married to a Jewess, and showed, that by his own admissions, he was a Bible-reader without a Bible!

During 1855, there were consumed in Ireland 550,169 gallons of wine, 139,084 gallons of foreign, and 6,228,856 gallons of home-made spirits, 4,808,354 lbs. of tobacco, 8,485,135 lbs. of tea, 830,230 lbs. of coffee, and 411,692 cwt. of sugar.

The collection in aid of the victims of the inundations in France, is progressing successfully in Dundalk. The Dundalk Steam Packet Company subscribe handsomely to the fund.

A water-dog belonging to Mr. W. Byrne, Kilmorey-street, Newry, lately caught a salmon trout, 3 lbs. weight. After several attempts, the dog, although muzzled, succeeded in effecting the capture.

We learn from the Cork Examiner that among the first who went to the Crimea, and the last who returned from it, was Captain Edward Byrne, of the Cork Steam Ship Company's vessel Cormorant. Notwithstanding the ignorance existing concerning the Russian coast, even among experienced seamen, he was one of the first who took his ship into the dangerous waters of the Black Sea, and navigated her all through without a single accident, at a time when the occurrence of the least accident would have been attended with the most serious consequences to the army. He was employed in carrying provisions when the existence of the troops depended from hour to hour on the receipt of supplies, and he brought back cargoes of the wounded and dying. So marked was his efficiency, that the Times Correspondent, writing at a most critical period, said the Cormorant, under his command, was worth any four vessels on the station. In visiting the line of attack before Sebastapol on one occasion, Captain Byrne was treated with much distinction by Lord Raglan. He received from the officers of the regiment which he took out a valuable testimonial in acknowledgment of his skill, courtesy, and gentlemanly bearing.

The Commissioners of National Education have awarded to Mrs. F. Doran, teacher of the Bann Female National School, a premium of three pounds for the order and regularity of her school, and efficiency as a teacher. This school was built a few years ago, at the sole expense of the patron, the Rev. John Byrne, P.P., Tullylish. W. A. Hunter, Esq., Head Inspector, in his selection of Mrs. Doran for a reward, has added another to the many proofs of his superior aptitude for the high position which, through the discernment of the Commissioners, he now enjoys.

On the report of Mr. Osborne, District Inspector, the Commissioners of National Education have awarded to Mr. Patrick Doyle, and to Miss Margaret Boyle, the teachers of the male and female National Schools of Ballyphilip, Portaferry, premiums for order, neatness, and cleanliness in their schools. The Cork Examiner thus gives the resolutions of the railway meeting at Fermoy: "Resolved unanimously—That the line of railway which meets the approval of this meeting is one which shall lead from Fermoy to the deep water at some point within the harbor of Cork. That a working Committee be now appointed, consisting of the following gentlemen: Robert Briscoe, Rev. M. A. C. Collis, Michael Bourke, Richard Carroll, Frederick Bell, Major Lucas, John George Nason, Arthur J. Campbell, and James McCreery."

While a party of men were reaping in a field near Sappamore, some dispute arose between them, when one of them, named Gavan, made a murderous blow with his reaping-hook at another, drawing it with great force across his neck, and nearly severing the head from the body. His recovery is deemed hopeless. Gavan has absconded. Two brothers of Gavan were hanged about eight years ago for the murder of a man under similar circumstances.

The Irish papers say that the millennium is surely about to be ushered in. It is in contemplation to sell the following barracks in the North of Ireland, the reason assigned being that they are not again to be occupied by the military, viz.:—Ballyshannon, Beleek, Belturbet, Cavan, Carrick-on-Shannon, Downpatrick, Derry, Lifford, Monaghan, Newry, Omagh and Sligo. The barracks at Belfast, Armagh, Charlemont, Dundalk and Enniskillen, are to be retained for the present.

One of the sons of Tyrone Power has been appointed to the important post of Deputy Commissary-General of the Commissariat Department. This young gentleman, Mr. William James Tyrone Power, filled the office of Assistant Commissary-General in Turkey, and his services in that capacity have been so highly appreciated that the authorities of the War department have bestowed upon him the second rank of the Commissariat.

The Militia-men convicted of murder and manslaughter at the Nenagh assizes—Burns, Barron, Carr, Laffin, Cummins and Ryan—have been sent from Nenagh to Templemore, and thence to Dublin, escorted by a strong body of police and twenty of the 17th Lancers. No person was aware of their going, but those who chanced to be in the street at the time.

Mr. Hugh McDermott, writing from Arklow, county Wicklow, states that whilst three poor men in that locality were searching for grains in the old gold streams, they found a fine nugget of remarkable purity, weighing more than six ounces troy weight. It is a very rich specimen of native gold. The gold mine is on the estate of the Right Hon. the Earl of Carysfort.

Chartres Brew, Esq., S. I., arrived at Caher from the Crimea, where he had been engaged for the past two years in the Commissariat Department. Mr. Brew, previous to his departure for the seat of war, was stationed at Caher, where he won the esteem and friendship of all classes.

The sentence of death passed on Private Patrick Burns, Tipperary Light Infantry, for the murder of Private Curley, 41st Regiment, has been commuted to transportation for life. The sentence of fifteen years transportation on the other four militia men, convicted at the last assizes of firing on Her Majesty's troops, has been mitigated to four year's penal servitude.

The election of a Town Councillor for St. John's Ward, Kilkenny, vacant by the death of Mr. Walsh, has taken place with the usual formalities. Alderman Banim presided as senior Alderman of the Ward. Mr. Thomas Murphy, of Coal-market, was elected.

The new act to extend the period for applying for sales in the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland, and amend the acts on the same, contains a clause of considerable importance. Applications for sales may be made within five years from the 28th July, 1856. By the former act the period was limited to three years, which would have expired last July.

Mr. Wm. O'Grady, teacher of Ballyorgan National School, county Limerick, lately established by the Rev. Dr. Meehan, P.P., has been awarded the highest premium given by the Commissioners of National Education, for the order, neatness and cleanliness observed in the above school.

Her British Majesty's mortar frigate, Forth, will remain in Kingstown Harbor during the winter. A number of young lads from the vicinity have joined her crew. After preparatory training they will be drafted to other vessels.

No fewer than three eloping couples have been in custody in Enniskillen within a week, and in each case the master's daughter had eloped with the servant man.

In the Irish language the electric telegraph is called "Segeal abata bolta," the literal translation of which is—"News upon stilts!"

The following very amusing letter appears in the Evening Mail:—

"Sir—It having appeared in your paper that her Majesty has signified her intention of creating Lord Talbot de Malahide Earl of Tyrconnell, it is reported that the title of Viscount Carlingford, which has been for some time the second title of the late Earl of Tyrconnell, would also be conferred on Lord Talbot, I beg leave to observe that no such statement has been published; neither should it be supposed that her Majesty's Ministers would have recommended any such proceeding, being aware that I have assumed my family title of Viscount Carlingford—and which I have done advisedly—nor would they, I am certain, offer any such affront to the representative of the celebrated Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, who, according to the late Lady Blessington, was Ireland's greatest patriot, and one whose ancestors rendered such signal service to the Royal cause, to the person of his Majesty King Charles the First, and to their country. I beg leave to add, that it is my intention, when properly prepared, to lay claim to the Earldom of Kent, being lineally descended from Thomas Godwin, Bishop of Bath and Wells, whose ancestor, Harold, son of Godwin, Earl of Kent, once occupied the throne of England. I remain, sir, your very obedient servant, 'CARLINGFORD.'"

The inhabitants of the town and neighborhood of Kilmallock, have determined to raise funds for the revival of the fairs there, under the provisions of an existing charter for the purpose. An immense number of the best horses in Munster, reared about Kilmallock, are continually changing hands, by private sale, to English and Scotch buyers, at an inconvenience which will be removed or lessened in a fair market. Situated in a rich grazing country, remarkable for its numerous herds of prime cattle and the production of large quantities of first-class butter, Kilmallock will become the centre of a stirring trade when once more established as a fair-place. The station of the Great Southern Railway line touches the outskirts of the town, running right and left to Cork, Tipperary, and Limerick, thus affording rapid transit to buyers for conveyance of stock—an advantage of the first importance, either to have cattle brought fresh into the field, or tired out of it during the winter months.

At a military investigation in the new barracks, Limerick, a color-serjeant of the 39th was deprived of his color and rank, and emolument as color-serjeant, for having been concerned in a military quarrel in a tavern adjacent to the barracks, where a billiard-table was kept. He was an excellent soldier, and had seen twelve years service with the regiment.

Last year Mr. Thomas G. Nairn, of George's-street, tried the experiment of keeping a swarm of bees on the roof of his house. The experiment was most successful. This year Mr. Nairn had three additional hives. It is estimated by Mr. Nairn that if the entire produce of the hives was sold in the London market, it would produce little short of £20.

Mr. Hugh M'Dermott, of Arklow, writes to the Dublin Freeman that while three poor men were searching for grains in the old gold streams, they found a fine nugget of remarkable purity, weighing more than six ounces troy weight. It is a very rich specimen of native gold. The gold mine is on the estate of the Right Hon. the Earl of Carystort. The piece of gold will be sold for 30 pounds.

John Clancy, an old man on crutches, who was stated to be over ninety years of age, has been charged at the Limerick petty-sessions with vagrancy and obtaining money by pretending to cure the toothache by a charm. The "charmer" on undertaking to leave the town, was discharged with a caution.

The Board of Commissioners of National Education have awarded a premium to Mr. R. Clarke, teacher of Dromore National School. This school is conducted in such a satisfactory manner, that the commissioners have expended this summer about £200 on the school-rooms.

It is stated that a number of mercantile gentlemen in Dublin propose establishing a new Liberal daily paper. They have in view the the reform of the customs' and other revenue departments.

The people of Loughrea propose to form themselves into a company for the construction of a railway from that town to Attymon, on the Midland line. The distance is eight miles. The project is encouraged by the Marquis of Clanricarde.

The Archbishop of Cashel has appointed the Rev. Edmund Ryan President of Thurles College.

The Earl of Carlisle—who really is not a bad sort of man, though Dr. Cahill denounces him as the patron of the Soupers, and who, if he had the good luck to be Lord Lieutenant twenty years ago, would be quite as popular as the "chivalrous" Marquis of Normanby, whom O'Connell called "the best Englishman that Ireland ever saw"—the Wexford People says, is going to Wexford to lay the first stone of the Crimean Heroes' Monument. He will stop at Johnstown Castle, the residence of Sir Thomas Esmonde, and of course, while Irish heroes who fell in the service of England will be talked of, nothing will be allowed to remind him that a near relative of the esteemed proprietor of that Castle fell in a very different cause some fifty years ago. Apropos to this, the People mentions, that a man named Francis Maguire, with his wife and two children, were lately admitted into the Strokestown workhouse. Maguire had been a private in the 9th Foot, and served nine years—three of them in India—where he had been present at two general actions, Moodkee and Chillanwallah. The climate destroyed his health, and he was discharged as unfit for service, with a pension of 6d. a-day for eighteen months. At the expiration of that period, the representations of some influential parties obtained a continuation of the pension for six months longer, when it ceased. The man's health is such as unfits him for earning his bread, and it is the opinion of Dr. Shanly, who gave a certificate to that effect, that it will never improve. And yet, the People indignantly concludes, although £6,000 a-year can be obtained to pension off a bishop already wallowing in wealth, the country has no better recompense to offer this poor soldier than a pauper's rations.

An occurrence of a very serious nature took place very recently, at the fair of Kilmuckridge, county Wexford. A fight was going on between two factions in a public house, when the police were called on. Upon entering, both parties joined in an onslaught on the police, three in number, and beat them so shockingly that one of them is scarcely expected to live, another was so frightfully injured as not to have recovered his reason since; the third was also severely injured. A man named Edwards, the only prisoner yet taken, has died of bayonet-wounds inflicted on him during the affray.

Alderman Reynolds has made the Lord Lieutenant weep. There can be no doubt about it. So the Nation assures us; and the facts support the statement. At a meeting of the Traders' Alliance in the Music Hall, the worthy Alderman mentioned, that upon his laying before the Viceroy a true statement of the carmen's sufferings, the Earl of Carlisle had been moved to tears, and in forty-eight hours afterwards the order for the suspension of the 45th bye-law was issued.

The Anglo Celt has a glowing account of the reaping at Deramfield, the property of Dr. Hinds. Two hundred laborers assembled to aid him, and having cut down 120 acres of as good oats as ever grew, on his Drumlane property, they set off, two by two, for Killatowny, to make similar havoc there. They were met half way by the Killatowny men, and all having joined in the body, they proceeded for the scene of operations, and marched through the town of Killeshandra to the tune of "Patrick's Day." When the work was all finished, the Doctor regaled them, paid them their wages, and set them to dancing, which they kept up until an early hour the following morning. After this, says the Celt, let us hear no more of the disaffection of Catholic laborers to Protestant employers. Dr. Hinds is a Protestant, the harvesters are Catholics; and yet they went to him and stuck by him all the time they were required, though higher wages were actually offered to them elsewhere.

The Month's Mind of the Right Rev. Dr. Egan was celebrated in the new Cathedral at Killarney. The Right Rev. Dr. Delany, Bishop of Cork, officiated, assisted by the Very Rev. John O'Sullivan, P. P., Kenmare, with the Rev. Mr. Fitzgerald, O.S.F., the Rev. Mr. Sheehy, P.P., Newtownsandes, as deacon and sub-deacon. The Earl of Kenmare, Lord Castlerosse, the Countess Dowager of Kenmare, and Lady Ellen Browne were present. The Right Rev. Dr. Moriarty, Bishop of Kerry, preached the funeral oration. The pillars of the church, the screens and altar, were draped in black for the occasion. The Bishops and several of the clergy were entertained at dinner the day following by the Earl of Kenmare.

The London Times says that the disputed claims to the title and estates of the Earl of Shrewsbury promise a renumerative harvest for the legal profession in Ireland as well as in England. The petition of Major Talbot, of Castle Talbot, in the county of Wexford, has been already lodged in the department of Sir Bernard Burke, the Ulster King of Arms, and it is believed here that, unless fortune prove even more than usually fickle, there is a fair chance of the prize being carried off by the gallant major.

The Belfast Ulsterman learns by a special message from Liverpool, that a mail has arrived from Australia. Amongst other news is the announcement that Mr. Duffy's election for the representative district of Belfast, in the Colony of Victoria, is assured, and that his admirers have raised for him the necessary qualification. It is stated at the same time that with one section he has grown unpopular—apparently because he has accepted the new law of the constitution, such as it is.

Great sensation was caused in Mallow very recently, on its being known that a girl named Mary Brien, had died in the workhouse hospital of hydrophobia. She was a servant in the Imperial Hotel, Cork, and about a month since got a bite from one of the cats in the house, which was considered at the time very trifling. An inquest was held on the body, when a verdict in accordance with the facts was returned.

The cottage of James Whelan of Tangier, near Maryboro', has been lately entered, and £50 teken out of the box, for which the parties who committed the robbery must have had a master key. There was no notification of the matter given to the police till Thursday three weeks, when Head Constable May and a party searched some suspected premises under virtue of a warrant. After prolonged exertions, they at last turned up the corner of some old walls belonging to Thos. Haslam, of Clonad, £14 in notes, and in another angle £2 0s. 6d. in silver.

The labors of the Jesuit fathers in Athlone continue to be attended by the population of town and country. Referring to the result of these labors, the Athlone Sentinel states, that John Carr, of the Longford Royal Rifles, abjured Protestantism, entered the Catholic religion, and was baptized in the true faith.

In consequence of the alteration recently made in the rule of promotion in the constabulary, the efficient officers are retiring from the service, and devoting their energies to other pursuits. Heretofore the rule was intelligence and activity, but this has been superseded by the rule of seniority, thereby completely debaring the young man from promotion, be his services ever so deserving.

DUBLIN LETTER.

A visit to Richmond Prison—Tara Hill in the Pennitentiary—O'Connell—Curran and his Priory—Emmet's house—Davis's grave—an old locality in Chancery—the Smoke of Dublin city—Prison-room of Smith O'Brien—memories about it—Meagher's cell and La Lionne—McManus's cell, and what he was up to when in it—John Martin—Survey of the Treadmill—a Wag "going the rounds"—a Patriotic Thief, &c.

DUBLIN, September 6th.

Yesterday I paid a visit to your old quarters in Richmond Prison. I hadn't been there since O'Connell left it. No change is perceptible. The walls are as solid, gray, and gloomy as ever they were. The turnkeys seem to partake of the grimness of the bars and bolts they monotonously watch. The little hillock in the Governor's garden is undisturbed. It overlooks the walls, the windows of Clanbrasail street, the Grand Canal, the bridge and road leading to the Cemetery of Mt. Jerome. It was called Tara Hill in O'Connell's time. The Liberator was fond of visiting it. He did so every day of his imprisonment. Sometimes twice a day. Folding his arms across his brawny chest, with a tranquil tearful eye, he used to look from the mimic mound over the scene which girdled him with so much beauty, poetry, and glory.

To the right—a few perches beyond the prison-wall, on the other side of the canal—he saw the house where Robert Emmet, for some days after the emeute in Thomas street, lay concealed, and in the garden at the rear of which he was seized by Major Sirr. Trees intervene, and the road abruptly turns off. But for that, O'Connell might have caught a glimpse of the Priory—Curran's country-seat—where the clouds gathered over the great heart and genius, the story of which Davis has told the world with so much love and eloquence. Beyond that again, the cypress and the yew stand sentinel over the vault in which Davis sleeps. Beyond them all, the soft, green, wavy outline of the Dublin mountains blends with the mist or sunshine, as the day may chance. To the left, broad fields of dark-green grass stretch away to James street and Old Kilmainham, the Circular road running between them and the front wall and gate of Richmond Prison. Dismal fields—fields surrendered to weeds and snails—never trodden by a hoof—seldom visited by a luckless sparrow or an outcast crow. They've been in Chancery for years. With us, Chancery signifies beggary, desolation, wreck

To the north-east of these fields, we have the smoke of the city. Sometimes it is yellow—yellow as a November fog in London—yellow as Poor-house soap—that is, more brown than yellow—less like amber than molasses. At other times, it is a sparkling white cloud—beautiful and spotless as the snow of Chamouni. I have seen it from the ragged summit of Killiney, when all the colors of the rainbow played in rivulets, as if from dissolving vases of gold, porphyry, and jaspar, through it. But dark or bright, the spire of St. Patrick's cleaves it, and the black rim of Birmingham Tower flings it off, as a huge knight in armor doffs his feathered head-piece—and high above it, the victor of Trafalgar fixes his death-gaze on the waves which have been the echoes of his thunder. Many feet below him, the domes of the Custom-house and Four Courts in mute magnificence dilate. Houses and churches, colleges and palaces, crowd the space between the prison and these domes—a shapeless mass and jumble of red brick, sober Granite, and still darker Portland stone.

These—the striking points of the surrounding scene—did O'Connell, mourning his captivity, more or less distinctly catch, every time he stood upon that little mound within those sepulchral walls. The eyes with which he tracked them through gloom or splendor, have turned to stone. But still, through gloom or splendor, night and day, they rise up—the spars and rocks, the solitary masts and islands, of a sea no Arctic sailor can explore.

From the garden, I returned to the Governor's house. The Governor was out. His Deputy, however, very politely conducted me through the prison, for I told him I was anxious to have a look at your old quarters. Mounting the stairs on my right, I paid a visit to the room which O'Brien occupied. There's a bedstead without any clothes or curtains—a washing-stand—an empty book-case—a small square looking-glass hanging from a brass-headed nail in the wall above the washing-stand—a tenantless bird-cage and a picture-frame—that's all that's there. It has a mouldy smell, and looks as if some one, having died there a month ago, it had been haunted ever since. Since O'Brien left it, the flies and mice have had it to themselves.

Passing down the stairs from this dismal room—it was bright enough, the Deputy-governor intimated, when O'Brien had his wife and bright-eyed little ones about him in it—and passing through the passage and stern gruff door of oak, sheathed in iron, which divide the Governor's quarters from the less hospitable regions of the building, I stepped from a bleak—sunless yard into a narrow circular hall, in which the corridors on the ground floor terminate. The spiral granite stair-case, leading to the upper tier of cells, descends into this hall. Up I mounted—the Deputy-governor in advance, striking his keys against the iron balustrade, and talking all the while. He was talking about O'Brien. O'Brien's memory is one of flowers and sunlight to that dreary mausoleum.

At the head of the stair-case, we turned to the left into a pinched-up room with five corners, which room the Deputy-governor informed me was the scene of your breakfasts and dinners for nearly a year. It is covered with pink paper—very dusty paper—plentifully spattered with ink. An old sofa—the horse-hair bulging out of it through its ribs and elbows—and a paper-covered screen behind the door—are the only vestiges that survive of your sojourn. Matthews, the turnkey who had charge of you, is dead—dead these four years. His widow piously appropriated the rest of the furniture.

From the gaunt window with which this deserted banquet-hall is lighted, and through the despotic bars with which it's faced, I looked out, over the Circular road, on to the fields of dark-green grass already noticed. The Wellington testimonial in the Park was plainly visible. So, too, were the roofs of the Royal barracks—long deep lines of limestone parapets and purple slates. These features of the panorama are not discernible from Tara hill. They lie too far behind it to the northwest. A squadron of the 16th Lancers, passing at the time, filled in the picture with the gayest coloring. Most of the regiments which furnished the guard for the prison, the period you were confined there, fought brilliantly in the Crimea—the 33d especially.

A step brought me to the cell you occupied. It was open. The iron door—one smooth compact mass of iron—stood stiffly on its hinges, with its back against the wall. The monstrous padlock—a cannon ball flattened out and beaten into the shape of a bullock's heart—hung from a thick porpoise of a ring midway up the door, two inches from the sill. It's a solitary cell now. No one rents it. As still as one of the vaults in the neighboring cemetery of Mount Jerome, it's just as dim and cold. The chilliness of it set my teeth chattering. The very look of it was enough to inflict rheumatism. And this was the nook of a catacomb you lined with red cloth, and pillared with books, and festooned with German pipes and blouses, and warmed into gay life with colored crayons brought from Paris! Your favorite, La Lionne, is my companion now. Her features are as beautiful and frank to-day, as though no summer had lost its roses since she shared your cell, and those ruby lips of hers release the smoke of her cigarette just as gracefully and cooly as they ever did.

The cell tenanted by McManus was the next one I visited. A gentleman of the legal profession, undergoing a mild imprisonment for libel, resides in it at present. He was sitting on a round block of wood, reading the Bible, when I looked in. From the winterish expression he wore, it must have been the afflictions of Job he was reading. As the door opened, he turned a doleful face towards the light, nodded with a morose composure, and then resumed his book. Patience on a Monument! What a different picture from McManus, with his hearty rollicking laugh, his soldierly bearing, his dash, gaiety, and bounding manhood!

"Mr. McManus, sir," the Deputy-governor remarked to me, as he closed the door on the melancholy Jacques, his block and his Bible, "Mr. McManus, sir, was the life and soul of our prison. He was perfectly at home here, sir—was master, I may say, sir, of the entire establishment. He took the garden completely out of the hands of the Governor—the wilderness of weeds and dry branches blossomed into a Hesperides under his pruning-knife and hoe. He laid down the floor of a ball-alley there—plastered several square yards of the outer wall of the Convict department. He suggested several improvements in the bakery and kitchen. Had he been here a month longer, he'd have superseded the Governor himself, sir."

O'Dogherty's cell came next, and after that O'Donohue's. Both are vacant.

John Martin, I was told, had a room in the Hospital, owing to the weak condition of his health. There's a bad case—an ulcerated lung—in possession of it now. So I didn't gratify my curiosity with a peep at the medicinal dungeon, which the gentlest and most saintly of all the Rebels of '48 exchanged for the snug old homestead, the mellow fields, and the veteran oaks of Loughorne. Descending the stairs I came up, I strolled into the workshops; and, passing through the kitchen, indulged in a morbid survey of the tread-mill. Three venial sinners, in gray trowsers and jackets, were exercising their legs at this lugubrious game of rotation. One of them, an old offender. An old offender, with crooked bright eyes, a broken nose, and stumpy legs—the stumpiest legs conceivable. Turning his head round to have an agreeable squint at the strangers, as we entered this arena of monotonous Gymnastics, the poor sinner received a smart intimation to mind his business, from the cane of the turnkey superintending the profitless labor.

"That fellow," said my friend, the Deputy-governor, "is a wag—a profound wag. He told the Doctor, the other day, he was in here for running away with a hay-stack."

I asked if he had been an inmate of the prison for any length of time. The Deputy-governor said "for years." That is, he hardly was out—one sentence complied with—before he was back for another term.

"He was here, sir, when Mr. O'Brien was with us."

"What a persevering sinner!"

"Yes, sir," the Deputy-governor continued, "and Mr. O'Brien may possibly remember him, for he told Mr. O'Brien that it was on his account he was in prison, for he borrowed thirteen shillings to get down to Ballingarry, he said, and the woman he borrowed it from (she was asleep at the time) had him arrested for house-breaking."

He was a thoroughly well-seasoned vagabond, in fact, and being a profound wag, as the Deputy-governor remarked, thought to dignify his larceny with a patriotic excuse. Outside those prison-walls, there are many "highly respectable gentlemen" who perpetrate grand larcenies, day after day, on the credulity of the people in the name of patriotism. They, as well as the gentleman working the treadmill for running away with a hay-stack, should take to heart the motto on the façade of Richmond Prison—

Cease to do evil—Learn to do well.

After the glowing pictures of military reviews and the presentation of colors in the Park, and other vice-regal festivities in and about Dublin, this colorless sketch of a very noted institution may be not altogether displeasing to the friends of

KILMAINHAM,

Another Letter from "Kilmainham."

REMINISCENCES OF '98.

DUBLIN, SEPT. 11, 1856.

Go up Church street from the Quay, and on the left is the gateway of St. Michan's.

The Church is very old. It was built by the Ostmen.

Within the yard repose the remains of several of the men of '98. The brothers Sheares in the vault below—Emmet and Bond on the earth above. There has been some dispute as to Emmet's place of rest—but it is now unquestioned that within this yard the blank slab is to be sought. Here is the burial-place of the Emmet family. It will be found close by the south wall, opposite the tower of the church. A tomb, parallel at the sides, with marks of extreme old age, and bearing withal traces of beautiful and tasteful design, marks the spot where several of the Emmet family were laid. A descendant of the exiled Emmet visited it about ten years since—so say the church-yard gossips. But it was not here, with his forefathers, poor Robert was laid.

About forty yards down the walk that leads from the tower, due west, on the left hand, close to the side of the walk, and level with the ground, is an uninscribed slab. It is smooth and polished, as if the school-children made it a seat—the earth is scratched away from under the slab at the edge next the walk.

That this is Emmet's grave we can only assume from probabilities; but that it is, is most probable. In the days of terror that succeeded '98 and 1803, it was fatal to any one to manifest sympathy with the martyrs. They were buried in stealth, and secretly. Mystery and doubt hang, consequently, over the resting-place of more than one of them. By some it has been asserted that Emmet was buried at Kilmainham; but Dr. Madden has satisfactorily proved that St. Michan's Church-yard holds his remains. But yet this in itself does not point to the actual spot where they repose. There are two or three blank slabs in the yard. That the one before us is the one rests upon tradition.

At the west end of the yard are St. Michans' Schools. An iron railing divides the space immediately around the schools, from the rest of the yard, but within it the tombs are as numerous as without; and, apparently, from the space being used as a play-ground, the slabs are quite smooth and polished, and the ground beaten hard as a ball-alley. Entering through this railing from the east, turn to the left, and in the south-eastern angle of the space will be found a broken slab. It covers a vault —the vault of Oliver Bond and family. On the slab is the following inscription:

"Sacred to the Memory of
OLIVER BOND.
Died 6th Sept., 1789, in the 39th year of his age.
The noblest work of God;
An honest man."

Bond was reprieved, but died in Newgate.

It is unnecessary to enter into a detailed account of my visit to the vaults. When Dr. Madden was collecting materials for his "United Irishmen," he had the Sheares' vault opened, and there found, as you already know, the bodies in an extraordinary state of preservation. The head belonging to one of the bodies was missing, but, what was stranger still, the remaining head was fast to the trunk. I say it was strange, because the custom was to cut off the head after the body had been taken down from the gallows, and to hold it up, saying:

"Behold the head of a traitor," &c.

Why was this head not cut off?

One of the brothers—my old informant could not say which, doubtless the younger—was a fine handsome man. The night before the execution he procured a pair of scissors to cut off a lock of hair for a friend. During the absence of the jailor, he cut the hair entirely off his head, as close as he possibly could.

"Now," said he, with an air half-merry, half-sad, "no executioner shall hold up my head by the hair, and call out: 'Behold the head of a traitor!'"

And it was so. Though Jonah Barrington says he arrived at Newgate as the executioner was holding up the head, &c. It might and must have been that of the other brother.

I don't think Madden has any mention of this circumstance, but I feel strongly persuaded of its authenticity, for I have it from an old turnkey of the jail.

Armstrong, the betrayer of the brothers, I heard, still lives at Ballycumber, Kings county, where he is only known to the people by the title "Sheares Armstrong." He still draws each year, from Dublin Castle, a pension conferred on him by the Government of 1798, for his base betrayal of the noble brothers. Unhappy man! He never, to this day, stirs beyond the precincts of his demesne, unless attended by a constable. I have frequently met him, so attended. He has a most forbidding aspect; and mothers in the neighborhood are wont to silence the cries of their children by threatening to call "Sheares Armstrong!"

No more at present from KILMAINHAM.

P. S.—In the short account I sent you, a few weeks ago, of my visit to the scene of Lord Edward's capture, I omitted to mention rather a singular circumstance. I told you that the stains of the noble rebel's blood remained on the wall to this day. Notwithstanding this, the wall had the appearance of having been plastered over. I asked the proprietor if such were the case, and he admitted, rather confusedly, that the wall had been plastered. The blood had appeared through the mortar! A medical friend informs me that human blood has this property. Can it be? or is it a property peculiar to martyrs' blood?

BLACK "REPUBLICAN" SCURRILITY.

From the N. Y. Daily News.

In the last number of Mr. Meagher's excellent paper, the Irish News, there was an article entitled "Black and White," in which the popular error as to there being no slavery in the Northern States was calmly exposed. Among other things it maintained there was more kindness shown to the negroes by the Southern planters than the white mechanics received at the hands of the Northern manufacturers. Hence the rage of the nigger-worshipping fanatics! We principally notice the scurrilous attack which appeared in a Sunday cotemporary, to show how contemptuously the Black "Republican" organs speak of the German and Irish vote, when the wine is in and the wit is out!

We hope those Germans who have hitherto been deluded by the flatteries of the Fremont Jesuits, will read the insolent allusions of the print in question to all adopted citizens. If after this any of them cast their votes for the fanatics who wish to use them as catspaws, let them be prepared for any insult, if thus encouraged. Mr. Meagher having had the audacity to express an opinion, which is shared in by the majority of our citizens, is called "a foreign demagogue, and warned not to meddle in American politics!" This assault upon one of our most distinguished adopted citizens comes very opportune, being full of "suggestive reflections" to every citizen, whom the will of Providence doomed to be born in another land, but whom the same Providence destined to live and die good Americans!

THE ASPECT OF IRELAND.

From the Dundalk Democrat.

The aspect of Ireland just now presents a combination of matters, which form a strange and curious medley. We have a great deal of cant and humbug enacted at agricultural and cattle shows, where beasts, and not men, are the admiration of the powers that be. We have dinners given to militia regiments, at which there is a good deal of balderdash spoken, and a large quantity of nonsense and bad English flung before the nation. We have—and this is the most pleasing object in view—some hundreds of thousands of men and women, with sickle in hand, bending their backs, and cutting down the golden-tinted corn. We have reviews in the "Fifteen Acres," and presentations of new colors to old regiments; and the Lords of the Admiralty making their annual tour to inspect harbors, and vessels, and what not.

But all this is to sustain England in her present tottering condition. Agricultural shows are held to encourage the breeding and fattening of stock to fill John Bull's stomach. The militia are feasted, to put them in good humor with John Bull's rule in Ireland. Reviews are held to inspect his army; the Lords of the Admiralty make their annual tour to look after his navy; and Irish reapers are cutting corn to give him bread.

This is the way the game is played. There is nothing being done for Ireland—nothing to bring plenty, and power, and comfort to her people. They work and suffer—they spend year after year in providing for their masters the best things the land can produce, and they themselves live on the rubbish.

It was not so when Ireland had self rule. It was not so when she had a Parliament to guide her, to protect her trade, foster her commerce, encourage her fisheries, take care of her revenue, and make her respected. But those days are gone, and we have fallen into the hands of the Great Briton, who has taken care to destroy our manufactures, and has all but annihilated our commerce. He appropriates our surplus revenue to himself, and there is no one—not even an Irish member—to make himself acquainted with that question, and insist on having some portion of the Irish revenue given to this country for national purposes.

If we had an independent Parliament now, what a different aspect the country would present. It would give new life to the people. It would infuse a new spirit into every class; and beneath its fostering rule the humbug system practised here by England would soon disappear. The seas round our coast would be studded with fishing-vessels, and we would be exporting at least half a million's worth of fish annually, instead of paying nearly that amount for fish to foreigners. Factories would arise on the banks of our streams and rivers, and in the vicinity of our towns and villages; clothing our people with the work of their own hands, and exporting goods to other countries. The population would be profitably employed; would have money to spend, to enrich our traders and shopkeepers; the land laws would be reformed, and the land made twice as productive as it is. Our home and foreign trade would be more than doubled; and rags, squalid misery and beggary banished for ever from our shores.

Oh, it is a terrrible calamity to lose self government. It is handing your house, your business and your purse over to your enemy, to manage them as he thinks proper. And such is what has been done with Ireland. She is now ruled, not for the good of her people, but to aggrandize England. That country has the making of our laws, and possession of our public purse. We are obliged to bend to her will, and that is abject slavery. When shall these things end? When? Never, till Ireland is governed from sea to sea by Irishmen; till the cant and nonsense heard in Dublin Castle are drowned by the united voices of all creeds and classes in the land; and the reign of justice substituted for that of fraud and tyranny.

IRISH SOLDIERS IN THE BRITISH SERVICE.

From the Dublin Tablet.

The Irish are naturally soldiers. Father Campion describes them as "a people delighting in wars." "The bodies and minds of the people," says Sir John Davis, "are endowed with extraordinary abilities by nature." Their military qualities are eulogised by Hanmer and Holingshed, and, in more recent times, are proved to demonstration by their success as military adventurers in France; for, as Forman says, "France is not a country for cowards to gain renown in." In France the Irish certainly gained renown. Every nation in Christendom has appreciated the military virtues of the Irish. The Earl of Essex, Viceroy of Ireland in 1672, describes the Dutch as endeavoring in time to swell their army with five hundred Irish recruits. He likewise describes the French as making, at very nearly the same time, a similar effort to crimp 500 Irishmen. Primate Boulter's letters, written in 1730, describe French officers as constantly engaged in enlisting Irish soldiers. Ireland seems to have been a recruiting ground at this period to the principal monarchs and republics of Europe. Spain had its regiments of Hibernians; Austria its regiments of Taaffe; and several thousand Irishmen passed at one period into the Venetian service.

The English Government, which had hitherto excluded the Irish from its service, was forced by the exigencies of the American war, to substitute Irish recruits, who were cheap, for German soldiers, who cost a hundred pounds a man. Irish Catholics accordingly at that period were permitted to enlist, a permission which laid the foundation of the influence which at this moment they exercise in the British Parliament. Previously they had been employed by almost every other Government, while excluded by that of England. Subsequently they gradually ceased to enlist in other armies, while their numbers were multiplied until they came to constitute a majority in the army of Britain. At that time the external dependencies of England were limited, and at the present moment the sun never sets on the empire of Britain. At that time the subjects of Britain, external to these islands, amounted to three millions; they consist at present of a hundred millions. The extent of the British empire is attributable to the prowess of the British armies, to the victories and conquests of Britain. Whatever merit we attribute to the armies of England, we must likewise attribute to that people who long constituted the majority of those armies.

During the French revolution, the Irish clergy, who had been previously educated on the Continent, began to be educated in Ireland. The fury of revolutionary war abroad and the foundation of an Ecclesiastical college at Maynooth, united to keep them at home. They ceased to visit Catholic countries, and could no longer, as of old, act unconsciously as recruiting sergeants to the continental governments that gave them education. They could no longer say, as they inevitably said, to their young acquaintances, idling away their time in Ireland "a fine young fellow like you, would "rise to high rank in the French army." The Irish ceased to visit the Continent as priests and soldiers shortly after the American war, a time when, as Arthur Young informs us, "they were very reluctant "to emigrate to America." Their military migration to the Continent had ceased; their industrial migration to America had not commenced. The whole force of the Irish nation was thrown into the armies and fleets of Britain, and the union of these two nations resulted in the greatest and widest conquests hitherto recorded. During the American war, Britain was reduced to the lowest degree of weakness. During her wars with Napoleon, she manifested a degree of energy that astonished the world.

She manifested this energy subsequently to her union with the most military people in Europe, and, as we think, in consequence of that union. The Irish peasantry were indigent—the English artizans well paid. The penury of the Irishman urged him to enlist—the comparative comfort of the Englishman kept him from the army. The system of small farms, and the idleness inseparable from it, gave the Irishman an inclination for the military service, for, as Lord Bacon says, "generally all warlike people are a little idle." The factory system of England, and the unceasing industry inseparable from it, tended to divert the Englishman's mind from war, for, as Lord Bacon says, "delicate manufactures have in their nature a contrariety to a military disposition." The English became more and more civic, and a civic population is reluctant to exchange the comforts of the city for the hardships of the camp. The Irish became more and more rural, the competition of English manufactures gradually extinguishing those of native growth, and they gladly exchanged the misery of a cabin for the comforts of a barracks. Thus, there were four reasons: 1st, The condition of the continent; 2d, The position of the Catholic clergy; 3d, The misery of the Irish peasant; 4th, The comfort of the English artizan—all tending to throw the military service of the British empire into the hands of the Irish people. The British empire was never so great as between the extinction of the Irish Brigade in France and the second rush of the "exodus in Ireland." During this exodus the Irish emigrated to America with the spade, as before the American war they emigrated to France with the musket. Before the American war the English made use of German recruits, and since the exodus the Ministry have likewise had recourse to Germany. It is evident from all this that the Irish have served in large numbers in the British armies as soon as they ceased to serve in the Continental or Catholic armies.

But when you confide arms to a people, and engage them to defend your life and property, you must inevitably concede to them an equality of rights and privileges. He who is fit to be a soldier deems himself fit to be anything, and will soon insist upon this general aptitude. If the British empire could have excluded the Irish from military employment, they might have excluded them from every other occupation. But when this was conceded, nothing could be withheld from them. They purchased by their courage and their blood in the armies of England admittance into the Parliament of England.

It was impossible to refuse their claims to an equality of privileges and rights in the State when you had admitted them to an equality of perils and dangers in the army. The present influence of Catholics in the empire is an inevitable result of the very nature of things. The Englishman loved comfort, and stayed at home to enjoy it—the Irishman disliked misery, and went into the army to escape it. In the recent war, neither enlisted in as large numbers as the Government could desire. The Englishman still loves home, and will not enlist—the Irishman still hates misery, but escapes it by going to America.

ELECTRIC COMMUNICATION BETWEEN EUROPE AND AMERICA.

From the Cork Constitution.

Lying at anchor off Queenstown, for the last few days, may have been observed a small, unsightly, ill-painted, rusty-bottomed screw steamer, without one point of attraction about her except the stars and stripes fluttering in the breeze. Yet that boat, and some of the officers she contains, have been the world's wonder for a season, and have just now concluded a task which is the forerunner of an event more wonderful still. The Arctic was the vessel that was sent to rescue Dr. Kane, who had previously gone to rescue Franklin. She was successful, and brought home Dr. Kane and his crew, who had been obliged to abandon his ship and search. She was then a light ship on the American coast. She is now the bearer of Lieutenant Strain, of Darien notoriety, and Captain Berriman, who once before, and now again, crossed from Newfoundland to take soundings of the whole Atlantic, from St. John's to Valencia, with a view to ascertain the probable success with which a telegraphic cable may be laid between these points. The result is satisfactory. For some 50 or 60 miles from St. John's, and again on this side, is a bank varying from 25 to 120 fathoms. Between these there is a grand plateau nearly level, the bottom soft, composed of shells so fine that only the microscope can discover them, each shell perfect in its minute beauty, proving the absence of currents at the bottom, and, with due deference to Stephenson and others, the want of that vast pressure which was to be so dreaded, and exhibiting at every point not only a capacity, but the most perfect capacity for the very use for which it is required. The whole apparatus for arriving at these facts is most perfect. Steam power, separate from those of the ship, works the axle from which the sounding-line is paid out.

Soundings have been taken to the depth of 27,000 fathoms. By a neat contrivance each sounding shows not only the depth, but the nature of the bottom, which is brought up in five quills, and the temperature of the water, the latter being given by the expansion or contraction of metallic spiral ribands placed round a centre pin, fixed at the top, and attached at the bottom to a needle, and indicator, the latter remaining fixed after the first has ceased to act, showing the exact variation between the surface and the bottom. Most careful drawings have been made by Mr. Van der Berg (to whom has been assigned the special post of draughtsman) of the soundings, showing a profile of the bottom of the sea with the greatest accuracy. There can be no doubt that communications between Ireland and St. John's, distance of 1,640 geographical miles, may be regarded as a certainty. It is in the hands of a small American company, but though small, if its members possess but a tithe of the energy of their representative, Mr. Cyrus W. Field, who is also here making every inquiry, it will be enough to overcome every difficulty. Captain Berriman laughs at laying the cable. He asks but a ship large enough and he will undertake to do it at ten miles an hour right across. The company have obtained the sole grant for erecting telegraphs through the whole of Newfoundland, and have already some 1,700 miles at work, or will have in a few days, which is in connection with the American lines. The difficulties and trials of temper in taking these soundings have been tremendous. Repeatedly after "paying out" tens of thousands of fathoms of line, and getting all up within some sixty or eighty, it was snapped and all had to be done again. Six and eight hours have been occupied in getting one sounding only, and these have been nearly every half degree the whole way across. From the captain to the cabin boy, each has given his willing aid. No trouble was thought too much—no time too long—each appeared to feel the honor of his nation at stake, and proud in every way to advance the object in view. They have done their work well. Nature has granted all we could ask—art will soon do its part, while nature, science, and art, worked out by man's hand, will produce one grand whole to benefit mankind.

THE NEW IRISH PROPRIETARY.

From the Kilkenny Journal.

Let Ireland be grateful, for she has a very excellent prospect of escaping from all her old absurd Celtic prejudices, and basking in the glorious beam of British civilization. We find the following paragraph in the Ballinasloe Star :

"NEW SETTLERS.—The West of Ireland seems destined to be silently revolutionized by the Scot and Saxon. During the last week there have been a considerable number of new capitalists, on a small scale, looking out for farms. They are chiefly from the Northern counties of England, and are perfectly delighted with our climate and system of farming."

This is the real history of the country—the only history we have been "making" for several years. Our own poor unfortunate countrymen have been systematically exterminated, and the land has been handed over to British capital and adventure. Such is the delightful operation of our Land System. The rights of the poor creatures who have been tilling and improving the soil for centuries are altogether ignored, and English and Scottish capitalists are gradually taking possession of the country. There is scarcely a county in Ireland where a little colony from the other side of the Channel has not settled since the Incumbered Estates came into operation; and of course with new proprietors come new habits, and customs, and creeds—in fact, all those magnificent attributes which constitute England a Paradise of intellect and virtue!

But, after all, is this change of the proprietary of Ireland, which we regard with such philosophic complaisance, a subject for real congratulation? Take the case of Mr. Pollock as an illustration. He is a rich Scotchman, who purchased a Galway property, inhabited by nearly three thousand people whose families have been living there, generation after generation. What is his first step? Te serve them all with notices to quit, and by one single stroke to reduce them to the level of day-laborers! Is this any extravanant change for the better?

But, let us not be mistaken. We know that the Incumbered Estates Court has effected most beneficial changes throughout Ireland—eradicating a race of bad landlords, who both plundered the people and dishonored the country. We cannot be in ecstasies with it, however, because, in connection with the present odious Land System, it is simply a powerful engine in the hands of the stranger and the proselytizer.

These foreigners will never thoroughly harmonize with our own people. From the day on which the Norman first planted his iron-shod foot on Irish ground, it has pressed upon us heavily, and though occasionally, as holders of the Irish soil, Englishmen have been found in collision with the British Government, it was as a party, and not as expressing the Irish national feeling. The only approach to union which ever existed between the two races was during a short period of the "Confederation of Kilkenny" when the "Catholics of the Pale" for a moment forgot their contempt for the mere Irish under the pressure of the danger to which their common religion was exposed. Nor had the patriotism of Molyneux, Swift, or Berkeley, any higher origin than this—the desire of retaining their ascendancy over the Celtic people. Thus Molyneux says, in asserting the independence of Ireland: "Supposing Henry II. had a right to invade this island, and that he had been opposed therein by the inhabitants, it was only the ancient race of the Irish that could suffer by this subjugation; the English and Britons that came over and conquered with him retained all the freedom and immunities of free-born subjects, and there remains but a mere handful of the ancient Irish at this day." Swift invariably speaks with the utmost contempt of the "natives," meaning thereby the ancient Irish, as distinguished from those of English descent; and even Berkeley, the gentle Bishop of Cloyne, speaks in a similar strain.

Of course, the experiment will proceed, but there will never be a complete amalgamation of the two races. Reversing all the maxims of sound political economy, the present rulers of Ireland are simply sowing the seeds of a Revolution.

LAMARTINE ON THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

From the Cours Familiar de Litterature.

To one who has spent any portion of his life in this country, and has held intercourse with its superior intellects, it is manifest that the standard of excellence has not sunk from the time of Dante, of Machiavel, of Petrarch, of Tasso, till the present time. Italy is full of men of the same heart and genius—they only want a voice. Unity is broken, but individual energy survives. Let the federal unity, the only unity now possible in Italy, be restored, and the world will stand amazed at the intellectual superiority in every species of intellectual cultivation with which nature has endowed the modern Italians. This federal unity of Italy, however, will never be restored except under pressure of some great peril common to all the infinitely-divided nationalities within the Peninsula. Moreover, it would be found necessary to establish, for at least ten years, the protectorate of some armed power, which should have no designs of territorial aggrandizement, and should be willing to play the part of a mediator. I mean that this unity will not be restored, except amid the bloodshed of a terrific struggle—an European struggle, whereof the plains of Lombardy and Piedmont will, for the hundredth time, be the field. Nor is this all. There must be a generous magnanimity in that power which is to establish freedom and to play the part of a mediatrix. An European Washington can alone achieve this miracle. With the heroism to protect, without the ambition to conquer—such is the qualification—prodigiously rare, indeed—of the future liberator of Italy.

And here let me indulge in an historical digression—involuntary on my part—which circumstances force upon me without my seeking.

I am sometimes told in a tone of reproach—inspired, I believe, more by ignorance than by injustice—tu es ille vir!—Thou art the man!—or, rather, "Why was it, that in 1848 you did not see that you were the man?"

In order to understand why I have not been that man, my most secret thoughts at that time must be understood, as well as the mysteries of the truly novel position in which France then found herself—gasping in the agonies of a sudden unforeseen revolution, and encompassed with the perils of a newly-born republic. In a few words I will unfold my most secret thoughts, and the real character of the situation in which a revolution so sudden had placed France, of whose foreign policy I had the conduct. You will then judge whether the circumstances of my position were such as that I—and I alone—could have aided Italy, could have secured her independence, or interfered as her mediator. Italy herself will know whether to condemn or acquit me. I will admit everything, both for and against me. In history silence is falsehood. He who knows not everything knows nothing. I will tell all.

First, it is essential rightly to appreciate the man, to comprehend truly my individual character and the genius of the part I played in that terrible and sublime moment when the republic burst from the clouds with the speed and blinding brilliance of lightning. A government, for the origin of which I had no respect, but against which I had not plotted, had just been engulphed, and vanished in three hours without a struggle. Within an hour, surprised, as I was, like all the world, I thought (as I still think) that the only means of re-establishing at once a solid foundation of things was to proclaim upon the ruins of the vanished monarchy a republic of necessity and of safety, in order to prevent anarchy, and to allow the people time to await the meeting of a national sovereign assembly, the only power—at all times legal—which could be evoked to impose order, and to command respect throughout France. I was not a radical Republican, a subversive Republican, a chimerical Republican, dreaming of the overthrow of the foundations of government and civil society, in order to create out of blood and fire a new world, perfect in three hours. New worlds are not born except after slow gestation, and the laborious childhood of centuries. I was an improvised Republican, a Republican from expediency, a Republican upholding everything which ought to be upheld in society under the penalty of death—order, life, freedom of religion, property, industry, legal freedom, the mutual respect of all classes of citizens, peace between nations in their mutual independence, and in the spirit of their treaties the public law of Europe.

Was I wrong to be a conservative Republican? The Republicans of another school tell me I was; nevertheless I was what I was. A man creates neither his own nature nor his own convictions, nor his own conscience. Right or wrong I was a Conservative Republican. Had I been different, nothing would have been so reasonable, or so simple as to let the flames of France, by the mere current of the wind that was then blowing, kindle the world. Out of the general conflagration would have come what alone could come—a heap of ashes quenched with showers of blood, forthwith to be trampled under foot by a military tyranny. In the eyes of the future the Republicans would have been the incendiaries of the old world. Sad title to the respect and love of the nations desolated with fire, and delivered over, as the Erostrati had finished, to the tender mercies of the Mariuses of the north and of the south. According to this theory, the first cry of the Republic should have been, "To arms!" Two couplets added to the "Marseillaise," the one against the upper classes, the other against property, would have finished the business.

France, roused from her bed, would, have flooded her frontiers and her laws—and woe to the world! Such were not my wishes for the new republic. My wish was to show once for all to Europe that between France and the neighboring powers—respected in their frontiers as in their independence—there was nothing incompatible. Mutual inviolability is the foundation of peace upon which reposes the world. To violate this foundation is not only a crime, it is war—wholesale murder—it is human blood thrown away at hazard and broadcast over the whole continent of Europe. And by what right? By right of an opinion, of a theory, of a fancy, of a vanity, of a whim of Danton, (and yet even Danton proclaimed only a defensive war, and negotiated with Prussia.) I confess my weakness. My conscience—the conscience of a man who fears God—spurned that game of human bloodshed whereof the stake is the life of his fellow-men. Despise me but acquit me. I kept the republic from an offensive war as a crime to humanity and to God; in thought I accepted for the republic nothing but a defensive and patriotic war. It was this scruple of conscience alone which dictated the manifesto to Europe. Scruple, do you say? I admit it; but at times a conscientious scruple is the best policy. Remember what happened. The confederated courts were deprived of all right of attacking the republic; the nations, respected and re-assured in the possession of their territory, came over to our principles, and within six weeks French diplomacy was the arbitrator of the world, having done no violence to any nation and without firing a single shot. Nevertheless, I did not for a moment disguise from myself the fact that we should hear of throbbings and agitations in Italy; that Germany would "put on her instruments" in order to uphold her alien but prescriptive power in Lombardy. I knew from the days of my youth the hesitating, repenting, relapsing, in short, to use a Latin word, the extemporaneous character of Charles Albert. I mistrusted the unreasonable hurry with which he would advance his army, or which he would submit to from his people. With this anticipation, too soon verified, it was necessary for the republic to assume a strong position of expectation by the Alps. I issued a decree for the army of the Alps, consisting of 60,000 men, and echeloned from Lyons to the frontier of the Var. What was the meaning of the army of the Alps? In my mind it had a twofold meaning, first, to be ready to descend into Piedmont on the first sign of peril to that power; next, to be ready to put down the religious, civil, socialist, and democratic commotions which might at any moment burst forth in the south of France—more ruled as it is by passion than the north—at Lyons, Avignon, Marseilles, Toulon, throughout the basin of the Saone and the Rhone. Thus the army of the Alps, by the mere fact of its existence, held peaceful dominion over Italy in front, and kept quiet by its right flank the south of France.

Like a proud river peering o'er its banks,

Again, what was this army of the Alps to do in Italy if the unreasonable rashness of Charles Albert should declare war against Austria; if, as I felt certain, Charles Albert should suffer a reverse, and if Austria, flushed with victory, should advance to invade Piedmont? Then, by the right which belongs to us, and for the legitimate cause of securing our own frontiers towards the south and the east, our army would have come down from the Alps into Piedmont, would have occupied the country, rallied the remnant of the valiant Piedmontese army, opposed the Austrian army, and fought, had that been necessary, for the evacuation and the independence of the whole Peninsula. But at that time fighting was not necessary; the revolution fought for us, in Hungary, in Prussia, at Frankfort, at Rome, at Naples, in Tuscany, at Vienna; and Austria, which had no existence except in her single army in Italy, had no notion of putting all to the hazard of a single battle; she thought only of the procuring for herself honorable conditions of retreat. She herself proposed to negotiate for the retreat to the foot of the Tyrol; in return for the evacuation of Lombard Italy, she asked only for the payment by Italy of her Italian debt. In such extremities there is little doubt but that 100,000 French covering 60,000 Piedmontese in the plains of Piedmont would have achieved, by their mere presence, or by the prestige of their name, the freedom of Italy. This is the less doubtful when we consider that Turin, Milan, Genoa, Parma, Piacenza, Bologna, Venice, Florence, Leghorn, Rome, Naples, Calabria and Sicily, had already, with no less patriotic enthusiasm, taken arms; that this military movement, still somewhat hesitating in a country unaccustomed to arms, would have increased, multiplied, and acquired organization on the right flank of the French army, and that Italy, in six months, would have become a forest of bayonets, ineffective, perhaps, but full of heroic spirit, like that which called the militia to arms.

What would then have happened in Italy? We have not the secrets of fate, but we may assert that we should have had what France would have advised, and what is consistent with the old constitution of five or six Italys—namely, an united patriotic confederation of all these Italys under their various political character, and under the protecting mediation of France. The national and military union of the political diversities would have been somewhat analogous to the Hellenic confederation of the towns, kingdoms, republics of the Peloponnesus, and the islands under the protection of the Macedonian phalanxes. No doubt there would have been agitations, blind restlessness, anomalies, inexperience, collisions, rivalries, excess in attack, excess in resistance; but the active armed mediation of France would have been a dictatorship of common safety—accepted from necessity until the time when this amphyctyony of allies could be replaced by this amphyctyony of the Italians established and armed in their own towns. Since the middle ages Italy is more municipal than national; a municipal confederation is the necessary form of its constitution. You cannot prevail against nature. But what a municipal confederation would that be which had, as its municipalities, capital cities, such as Milan, Turin, at the foot of the Alps, Genoa on the right, Venice on the left, Florence, Leghorn, Bologna, at the foot of the Apennines, Rome in the middle, Naples at the top, Palermo and Messina in its waters? And what a revival of political, military, oratorical, and literary greatness might be anticipated from a nation of 20,000,000 of men, endowed with a mind, genius, and more reason than light-minded Athens.

Such were my thoughts on Italy. I know that they will seem offensive to those Italians who urged the impracticable scheme of an union without bond, and an emancipation without emancipators. My duty was not to flatter Italy, but to save her. I did not flatter her. I did not excite the unseasonable risings of 1848. I call to witness her ambassador and her patriots of that day. Let them say whether I did not use my sincere efforts to turn aside King Charles Albert from his scheme of aggression, in which I foresaw his destruction? Let them remember my words at the tribune, too full of meaning. All the songs sung are not Marseillaises. At the present time I speak my mind of this nation with all sincerity; ripe for independence—ripe for liberty—ripe in eloquence—ripe in genius—it is not ripe for arms. Liberty placed those arms in its hands; but it needed a people of soldiers and veterans in glory like the French to teach the use of them. You may improvise liberty, but you cannot improvise the armies to defend it. There must be armies around the cradle of a new-born liberty. Let the future confute me if I am wrong; but let not the earnest patriots abuse me. My prudent and temporising policy on their behalf was more Italian than the policy of Charles Albert; it is the same even now, but for other reasons.

But, reply the Italians, embittered by exile; but, say the radicals of the revolutionary war in France, wherefore did not the army of the Alps go down into Italy after the defeat of Charles Albert, to assume that noble part of armed mediator, or of a combatant for Italy, which you had designed for it at its creation, and which you had put off until the hour when Piedmont should be invaded by the Austrian army? Alas, it is not I who must answer this: it is a date full of sadness. The day on which the defeat of Charles Albert was foreseen at Paris was the day when the order of march for the army of the Alps was without a moment's hesitation drawn up by the government of the republic.

The fatal communist or democratical insurrection of June involved the resignation of the government. Whilst the government fought in the streets of Paris for the safety of the republic and of the Assembly; whilst it triumphed through the army which it had prepared by the general which it had appointed, by its own hand, being itself both leader and soldier, exposing its life to the fire in order to defend the national repsesentation, that same national representation—the people—conceived the odious suspicion of a secret complicity with its enemies, and hastily demanded back from it the Executive power, in order to confer it upon a dictator as patriotic but not more devoted to France. The fatal coincidence of the battle of Paris with the defeat of Piedmont, entombed in the same abyss all the plans and all the dreams. A stranger since that day to the government, I know not what were the thoughts and the necessities of the successive governments of the republic in regard to Italy. All I can assert is, that the events of June, notwithstanding their importance, would not have hindered me from sending the army of the Alps down into Piedmont. All France was up and armed in defence of her civilization, her families, her property, her altars, her representative sovereignty, against some handful of destroyers who were annihilated by their own madness. The power of France within herself was increased an hundred fold; her military power was re-established, after five months of an energetic re-organization of her armies; France had no need of 100,000 men in readiness on the Alps or in Algeria to preserve her from the communists who are her aversion; Italy had need of them that she might remain Italy.

Such were my wishes for Italy; such were the things I did for her without her knowing it; such were the things decreed both for her and for me by an opposing destiny in the days of June, 1848. In those days, not only did France bleed, but Italy perished. Let us bewail together the madness of these destroyers of liberty and of themselves; but make no charges against us—Italy and us. We are innocent; destiny is to blame.

Had I been Italian in blood as I am Italian at heart, could I have conceived more filial thoughts to Italy? Could I without violence to the other powers and with more lawful zeal for her have opened a fairer prospect of national, political and literary revival! Let reflection and conscience declare the truth.

WM. SMITH O'BRIEN.

From the Limerick Observer.

This honorable gentleman has been in some degree compensating for the tedium of his weary exile by revisiting the scenes of his early youth—those historic and picturesque spots over which

"His childhood's footsteps loved to linger."

Since his return to Ireland he has visited some of the most interesting localities in Munster and Connaught. The visit from which he this day returned to Limerick, has not been the least interesting or agreeable. He left, on Saturday last, on a visit to our esteemed fellow-citizen, Francis Spaight, Esq., at his noble mansion, Derry Castle, on the shores of Lough Derg, with the elegant demesne and enchanting scenery of wood and water. He proceeded yesterday, accompanied by the Right Worshipful James Spaight, Mayor of Limerick, on an aquatic excursion up the river, which afforded him much enjoyment. The ever-varying panoramic views on all sides, as the boat glided slowly up the lake, seemed to excite his warmest admiration; the natural loveliness of that dear old land, from which, at one eventful period, it seemed to have been decreed that he would have been separated forever. Arrived at the holy island, he examined with great interest Sir Turlogh O'Brien's monument, with its ancient, quaint inscription. He next visited, on the side of one of the hills of Derry—the graves of the Leinster men—the interesting legend connected with which we shall give in our next. We were much gratified to see so decided an improvement in Mr. O'Brien's health and complexion, since his return to his native land; showing an elasticity of body and resuperative power of constitution, which we fervently trust he may live many years to enjoy.

TO FELICIA.
(FROM THE GERMAN.)

All the storms that rock my nature—
All the thoughtful calms that come,
As gray memories after action,
That in fullness must be dumb—

All the shadowy wraiths that haunt us,
Which men conjure from their glooms,
Becoming ghosts in thought to read
The future from their tombs——

All those storms, my own Felicia,
All those glooms—those living graves,
You can equalize by glancing,
As the skies o'er-rule the waves.

FINGAL.

"CORKMAN" writes us a letter concerning the duties of Irishmen in the coming Presidential election. We omit his complimentary sentences regarding ourselves, and come immediately to the body and soul of his communication. He says—"Three gentlemen are in the field, each of whom is backed by a numerous party, and it is said that owing to the mean, malicious and untruthful part taken by the organ that altogether advocates and represents the party, which has lately changed its name—that is the American party!—that Mr. Fremont will have a large portion of the "Catholic or Irish vote." Abuse of Irishmen and of the religion to which they have adhered with wonderful fidelity, characterize the leaders in this journal, and it would be desirable to put an extinguisher upon them. When a want of generosity, untruthfulness and a desire to falsify the Irish and their creed exist, it is desirable that every Irish gentleman should turn out and become a "brick." Where are your walls and fortifications, said one distinguished military leader to another whom he visited, for whose especial honor a splendid military pageant was got up—there, said the host, pointing to his troops, are the walls, and every man is a "brick." This sir, is an old story, and may be worth repeating; ior if the walls of the Constitution, founded by Washington, preserved and guarded as they have been by so many eminent men, are in danger, or partly pulled down, it is to be hoped that the derided, insulted poor Irishman who has contributed so much to the glory and greatness of this country, will rush to the gap, and that every man of them will prove himself a "brick."

Early in November, at the request of several officers and privates of the New-York State Militia, Thomas Francis Meagher will deliver a Lecture in behalf of the widow and child of the late Captain Patrick Kerrigan, Commandant of the "New-York Irish Dragoons." From several letters received at this office, from Generals of Brigade, Colonels of Regiments, members of the Major-General's Staff, and several others—all of them distinguished in the militia and of high standing in the community—this effort to befriend the family of a true-hearted and whole-souled citizen, promises to be perfectly splendid in its success. It will be a magnificent Military event.

Mr. A. Henry, editor of the West Alabamian, writing to us from Carrolton, Pickens Co., Ala., says—"From extracts, I have formed a good opinion of your paper. I am rejoiced to know that you are on the right side in the Presidential canvass. Every Irishman who has a legal vote, should give it to old Buck next November, because, in so doing, he not only supports the best man—the only national man—but he helps to strengthen the democratic party; the party which has always stood up to, and protected the exile and emigrant (the Irish especially,) in the enjoyment of liberty, and protected him in his rights. Buchanan will carry Alabama by from 12 to 15, or may be 20,000 votes. Keep the Irish straight. Respectfully, &c."

"MALACHI"—It is a subject entirely outside of our province. It is difficult to say what occupation such a youth as yourself is best fitted for. At all events it is not by bothering strangers with letters that you will earn a livelihood in this country of energy and activity. Go about the first thing that offers and feel yourself capable of doing something. In a short time you will be able for anything, unless you are thoroughly good for nothing.

THE IRISH NEWS.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1856.

THE IRISH VOTE.

These words ought never to be mentioned. We sincerely deprecate the phrase. Political organizations, founded upon memories, hopes, and partialities of any country outside this Commonwealth, conflict with the integrity of the American Republic. Everybody knows what the American Republic means. It is bounded by the Pacific on the west, and the Atlantic on the east. Canada is a fringe—a very tattered one, on the north—and Central America a faded bouquet on the south. Botany and Republicanism will revive them both.

We sincerely deprecate every effort and syllable made or uttered to isolate the people, who thrown in here from Irish soil, have found their homes under the Flag of Washington. For it was he who made this Flag the symbol of a powerful and portentous nation. Such language may sound exaggerative, but we who have seen America from the Sierra Nevada to the Kaatskill, feel that no language is too exaggerative in the description of its promises, exuberant capabilities, and powers that are irrepressible.

As we have said, there should be no Irish vote here. There should be no Swiss vote. There should be no German vote. All these phrases tend to dislocate a great community which should be compact and indivisible. They tend—in fact they substitute different nationalities, each of them strongly marked and colored—for a people which should be a unit in political action, creed, enthusiasm, and hope.

No syllable has ever dropped from us—neither from pen nor tongue—to excite and perpetuate, within this commonwealth, this heterogeneous diversity of race. On the contrary, we regard this country as the great starting point—the promised land of patriots and inspired historians—men who feel that God has placed men upon this earth to do something nobler than fill their pockets, and exact exorbitant interest from the mendicant necessities of their poor brethren. We look up to it, not as the refuge—for that is a despicable word—but as the saving ark and regeneration of the world.

Not as the copyist and footstool of European princes, but as the great, stalwart, supreme Apostle of a new order of politics, social life, and national splendor, do we regard this confederacy of States, and vow to it, as we devotedly do, our heart, intellect, and blood.

But, heretofore, men have appealed to the diverse nationalities, the fragments of which have been flung in upon this land. Politicians—fluent and conscienceless reprobates—limitless gamblers in the great game of which Princes and Peoples are the stipulated stakes—statesmen even—orators of golden tongue—oracles of the pulpit, regardless of the noble Christianity in which all distinctive races should be submerged—have evoked the sentiment, and it may be the power, which, heading as it does this article, we deprecate and deplore.

However, deplore it as we may—deprecate as we may—even though Know-Nothings may legislate it down—it is a fact—a stubborn fact—and no fictitious phrase.

Being so, we are not to deal with it as we would with any speculative rumor of the day. We are to deal with it as we would with the Hudson, did we desire to cross it.

However created, provoked, magnified—whatever consequence or legitimacy attaches to it—there it stands—the Irish Vote. Desperate efforts are made by the followers of Fremont to have that vote. Their efforts are utterly and absolutely fruitless. They may publish Bulls, and O'Connell's Speeches, letters from James Haughton—scraps and scrapings from disordered epochs, and powerful but mere temporary demagogues—men of the hour and some floating phrase, but no erudite statesman or staunch patriot, with a successful country to give authenticity to his maxims—all their quotations and appeals, even those from the sarcophagus of O'Connell, are utterly unavailing.

The Irish vote—a substantial fact, as these Fremont men have by their sectional harangues made it—or if not made it, have in the political mass of the country notoriously thrown it out, and isolated from the aggregate in which it should be merged—this Irish vote, on religious grounds, on political grounds, from the intense love and loyalty the Irish race bear to the Constitution of the United States—of which their kinsmen, Calhoun, Jackson, and Buchanan have been the strict interpreters and champions—that vote shall be cast in a storm against them—that is against Fremont and for Buchanan.

THE SISTER OF CHARITY.

The age of Elizabeths of England and Catherines of Russia is gone by. Modern civilization does not favor the ambitious woman. In the past, she did not so much conquer the world by those gentler attributes which belong to woman, as startle it, by those more vigorous qualities which belong to man. But modern civilization, leading woman with graceful hand from those unbecoming positions into which feudal custom occasionally threw her, admonished her that, to enlist the sympathy and promote the welfare of Humanity, she must confine her lovely orbit within that sphere which the Creator designed it to adorn. The sphere of woman is the moral sphere. The moral agent, in the family circle which revolves round her sweet light, she becomes the most powerful and the most graceful agent for good upon the earth. The true friend of religion, the indefatigable inspirer of what is noble and lofty in man, the loving and disinterested adviser of the husband, the gentle, earnest teacher of the child—who can measure the beauty of the goodness a good woman can effect? If the impulses of a higher nature inspire, and education, and circumstances, and duty to those who, by the music of the blood, claim the tenderest cord in woman's soul, permit, who can expose with such chastening chastisement the iniquities of the wrong and the strong, and the sufferings of the righteous and the weak? Who can clothe with such consolation the heart of sorrow, or make so beautiful to the dying the avenue of the grave? The little hand of Jeptha can best slay the Holofernes of vice.

The time of Cleopatra, too, is gone by, because the time is gone by when homage is paid to vice and selfishness, on account of the fascinating drapery with which glorious endowment, acquired attainment, or incidental splendor of circumstance may treacherously surround the decaying disease. This age is past, and that of glory to women, who distinguish themselves in the field of moral heroism, has succeeded. The great obstacle to woman's triumphs in this beautiful sphere to which modern civilization has called her, is that ignorance, which too often clouds the female mind, and makes it unconscious of its own power and capability. The human mind is always slow to perceive the existence of powers, as long as the senses have not been struck with capabilities which only opportunity can shape into action. It is so with man, it is so with woman. It is the beautiful ambition of knowlege, and gentle cultivation of mind, which is not yet sufficiently developed in woman. Woman's spiritual nature is purer than that of man, but if unstrengthened by knowledge, it can only work by starts of intuitive impulse, instead of regular and directed steadiness. The animal character which marked the relations between woman and man, no longer exists in its primitive rudeness, but as long as man continues to flatter the fancy of woman, instead of appealing to her mind, it must still disfigure the communion of the sexes with its lingering trace. The grossness of the animal relation has become refined. Outward respect is paid to woman, but no respect is paid to her loftier nature, and no homage addressed to her intellect and mind. Hence it is, that woman does not feel the inducement to gather up her strength and shake off the cloud which hangs with dull weight upon her soul. As long as man grovels in materialism and selfishness, so long will woman trifle life away in silliness and frivolity. Woman's nature is passive, and leans upon man. As soon as he is fired with noble impulse, she gathers inspiration intuitively. When great revolutions rouse the apathy of man, she is the first to catch the holy flame. And once caught, there is no sacrifice with which her beautiful selfdenial will not feed it. Thus it was with the women of Carthage, who stripped the trailing tress to make a cross-bow for the warrior? Thus with the women of America, from whose patriotic fire our Revolution drew its strongest inspiration. But the question is, whether what is now an impulsive start may not be made a steady principle. Starred by sentimental, sickly youths, and foolish, fashionable old bachelors, so high that no man can reach her, she is only so stared at to be in reality lowered to a level to which no man will descend to raise her. Praised for the beauty of her eyes, the luxuriance of her hair, the gracefulness of her face—which pass away—she forgets to cultivate the beauty of her mind, the luxuriance of her soul, the gracefulness of her intellect—which last. Always left to guess at the drift of man's doings, never made to comprehend them, an ornament of Princes—a toy, a plaything, a spoiled child, a graceful drone, a thing to be cajoled, and carped at, to be looked up to fictitiously as an angel, to be the better in reality trampled on as a brute—to have her fancy tickled, her sweet smile awoke, but never to receive the manly homage of an enlistment of her feeling, or an elicitation of her thought. Yet woman is superior to man in power of feeling. Man is superior to woman in power of thinking. If woman's heart is touched, she acts. If a man's brain is stirred, he acts.

In few natures has this union found so beautiful a dwelling as in that of Florence Nightingale, the heroine of the East. Born of parents who are of the truest type of that rare, and where found, richest vein of the mine of mortality, the pure gentleman and lady, Miss Nightingale learned from a child to love what was noble, to scorn what was mean, to feel for those who were in sorrow, and to aid those who were poor. The family seat of Elmsly Park is bedded in one of those beautiful wooded vales of Hampshire, whose quiet beauty the engine has not yet blasted with his fiery breath. It is about two miles from Broadlands, the country seat of Lord Palmerston, between whose family and the Nightingales relations of the fondest friendship have long existed.

In the beautiful old English manor house, which sleeps in the soft valley beneath the shadow of a neighboring spire that rises above it as a sentinel Angel, and seems to gather in its peaceful fold all that comprises the perfection in its highest and loveliest sense of home, Florence Nightingale, with gentle culture, passed from childhood into youth. She has one sister, of the same beautiful nature as herself. There is no other child, and in the summer evenings the two girls might be seen, in the plain cottage bonnet and simple dress of an English lady, with the neat rush basket in hand, hastening to bring a few light luxuries to the bedside of some poor or sick cottager. As they passed, came from every side a blessing and a smile; and in many a humble home of Hampshire, the name of Florence Nightingale lingers as a household word. Miss Nightingale speaks seven languages, and is a proficient in various sciences. As her religion has been made a subject of discussion by some canting hypocrites of England, we may mention, that though from the absence of a clergyman of her own persuasion she attends when in the country the neighboring Episcopal church, she is in conviction and strict observance a Unitarian. Mr. Bonham Carter, member for Winchester, her cousin, has conformed to the Established Church, like many other English Unitarians, in deference to the false fashion which usually looks down upon all who are not of the select State creed. But the Nightingales have adhered with unshaken devotion to the Unitarian faith.

In person Miss Nightingale is frail and delicate. There is at times a shade of strange sadness passing over her pale and thoughful face, but when it lights it is full of sweet vivacity. And few can depict with more delicious archness the stupid sentimentality of a snob, or prude pretension of a pedant. Her lip is full at the same time of gentleness and strength. For several seasons Miss Nightingale mingled in the brilliant gaieties of London life, and though not physically beautiful, there hung about her a grace, and thought, and a spirituality which lent a more interesting charm. But though possessed of ample fortune, she steadily refused to give to one that which was meant for many, and at the bedsides of the German hospitals studied for some years, and took her degree in that lovely science which she practised in the East. There, where all was chaos and confusion, and pestilence and poison, and filth and fetidness, this beautiful vivandiere of humanity, by her gentle rule made comfort and cleanliness. What all the miserable Ministers and strong soldiers of England failed to do, one woman, of fragile form but firm heart did. Her devotion dreaded no danger. Her sacrifice has softened suffering. Her duty has not blanched at death. The woman's heroism has redeemed the nation's shame.

Modesty and humility go ever in woman, as in man, hand in hand with genuine knowledge and conscious power. Women of the Nightingale nature instinctively shrink from notoriety. They love to discharge their heroic task from a simple sense of duty. But if they do not court notoriety they do not dread it, if unsolicited it is the creation of the beauteousness of noble deeds. With the soul's eye forced on heaven, the mind's eye grasping the interests of earth, not even the most delicate scruples of gentle reserve and graceful modesty can trammel the determination of such women, if Humanity bids them forth. Florence Nightingale stands not alone. She has, thank Heaven, many beautiful sisters, who travel on their lovely path unseen, and who even more than her, ask no reward but the smile of the angel who records their deeds above.

Among that beautiful band of Angels, who hovered with soothing wings over the bloody battle-fields of Inkermann and the Alma, were many, nay most, of an army of comforters, who need no great occasion to call them forth, but who silently and noiselessly wherever is suffering and sorrow, hold up the redeeming cup from the burning plains of Singapore to the wild prairies of Wisconsin. And now that Florence Nightingale has retired to her home crowned with a world's admiration, let it not be forgotten that there are in this city, and every great city in the world, a citadel of Catholic humanity, from which walk forth every day, a hundred Florence Nightingales,—those unsung angels, the Sisterhood of Charity.

A NATIONAL LOSS.

The Adriatic has not yet been wedded to the impatient sea. It lies—as Canning described the English war-ships in his speech at Portsmouth—sleeping on its shadows in the bold stream which washes on the East the docks and warehouses of this Venetian city. Sailors, merchants, statesmen, Grand-Dukes, and imperial Princes look for her eagerly.

She is to be the wonder of the ocean. What Cleopatra's silken-sailed galley was to the Nile—what the Bucentaur was to the calm waters which wash the lion-crowned pillars of Saint Mark—what the royal Harry was to the stately reign of the great Lutheran king of England—what the beaver-tailed steam monarchs, sweeping with their freight of crimson-coated battalions through the golden-gated Bosphorus have been in history, to the serene magistracy of Victoria—this noble structure, now anchored close within hearing of our city-bells, will be to this age and this republic.

So too with the Niagara, destined to bear in its staunch bosom the thunders of the New World—a fierce, but beautiful Amazonian of the seas—which, but the other day, this gay, brisk and fortunate community baptized. Wreaths of luscious flowers—the Magnolia of the South, and the still whiter glories of the gardens that border on the Canadian Lakes—fell upon her brow, as she leaped to life, with a buoyant plunge and tumult amid the waving kerchiefs, the saluting hands, and the uproarious thunders of our mercantile and federal ships. The Republic, with its great wings spread, and its trumpet pealing—as Michael Angelo would have pictured it—hailed the birth and baptism of its daughter, and through the heavens, above the seas, announced her swiftness, invincibility, and glory.

He who in his clear brain devised those perfect and potent structures—those Minervas of the deep—so full of grace, yet so full of fury, energy, and vengeance, lies tame and cold this night—gone from this earth in the activity and splendor of his brain. Shipwrecked in a squall of fortune, he lies stranded on an ignoble beach, with these proud monuments, with swelling sails, panting for their career of armed Democracy and Freedom, streaming from their stately spars, evidences to the world of his genius and calamity.

Thus God afflicts the world.

Thus God teaches this troubled planet—thus in vivid characters—vivid as the lightning in the Tropics—that the Humanity He saved once, which He watches, the glory of which shall be His glory, is not in the keeping of one favored brain—fruitful as it may have been—productive in gorgeous fabrics of skilled workmanship and scientific calculation as they may have been—but that, as the sun shines, as the storms blow, as the great rivers exhaust their lives in a depth, which, like man's life, no line can fathom, his bounteousness overlooks all wrecks and losses, and even in the half-finished works of those He has taken from us, leaves—as the brazen serpents in the wilderness—tokens of His watchfulness, and assurances of his Providence.

CLOUDS AND SUNSHINE.—A BURIAL AND A BRIDAL.

The humblest writer on the Press leads a chequered life. He passes through the shadows and the effulgences which alternately divide this poor Earth into Elysium and Erebus. One day he congratulates his friend upon the budding hope of his house and fame. He walks along, and having met a schoolfellow whose footsteps have tracked through the desert the pompous footprints of Crusaders and buccaneers—the Richards and Pizarros of a presumptuous massacre and conquest—congratulates him upon his adventurous achievement.

Paris, under the rule of its equivocal Augustus ; Vienna, with its subdued pleasures and diplomatic neutrality ; Italy, with its confused intrigues and struggles for unity, and its lyric and historic aspirations for a resurrectionary stability and splendor—these, and a multitude of other names and topics, excite his sympathies, the hazardous goodness of his heart, and the fluent fervor of his pen.

Apart from these—low down, as it were, in the Valley of Life—come the roses which win his smile, or the cypress which with its cheerless shadow compel him to the saddest meditation.

Into these remarks we have been led by the occurrence of two events which have taken place since the last issue of this paper.

On Friday week, in the quiet, sweetly-colored aisles of Grace Church, surrounded by many of the oldest and most venerated citizens of this great city—with a crowd of healthful, prosperous, and proud young fellows round us and about us—with the solemn service of the dead breaking on our ears in muttered accents, from a gray-haired feeble minister of God—we looked upon the coffin of a friend, whose heart was sunshine to us, exiles and strangers as we were, in moments of the most tearful solicitude and trouble. Did we not throw a chaplet of tributary flowers upon that coffin, we should feel that a good, a gracious, and a grateful duty had been neglected. There are men who say that public life is a sterile ground in which none of the sweetnesses and piety of humanity take root. There are men—and in this day their name is Legion—who would, with an iron sword, preserve this life from all intrusion, the kindliest and most genial that could approach it.

Perish this harsh doctrine! Away with these stubborn preachers and panygerists of mere cash and falsehood! The world is as beautiful as it ever was, and they who in spite of Civilization, Commerce, and the Practical Good Sense of the Nineteenth Century, which after all is Hypocrisy enthroned, and nothing else—inculcate the contrary doctrine, we spurn rom us as we do thieves and loafers. If a good heart—a full, generous, guileless heart—quickness to perceive the malevolence of the intriguing world, and promptitude to repel it—if a chivalrous anxiety to see liberality of heart crowned with success, and the goodness of impoverished Patriotism and qneenly Republicanism—if an eager curiosity to detect and a swift promptness to expose the malignant spies and conspirators against the decency and happiness of society—if a brave young fellow, with the best of impulses, the kindliest and most impressionable disposition, and a future of social and civic honors crowding on his foreshadowed path through this our rich and stalwart Commonweaith, which path he would have noiselessly, unostentatiously, but firmly and right honorably trod—if such incidents and features in a young man's life deserve an epitaph, James Roosevelt has it from all those who knew him from childhood up to manhood, as he has it from one, a sorrowing friend, who but knew him, but yet felt his warmth and freshness, and the promise of a fruitful morrow, in the quick sunset of his day.

Over this black coffin, under the lid of which so many hopes and promises have crumbled into dust, we offer our condolences.

But, as we have said, the humblest writer on this poor press, passes from clime to climate—from clouds to sunshine, with a strange rapidity ; delicate men who write great histories in velvet-cushioned libraries, would say it was the rapidity—possibly the eccentricity—of a vagabond. But so it is. We obey our fate. From Erebus to Elysium.

Wandering about the world—having with his wild harp, from some obscure crevice of Glendalough, stirred the rebel blood of Ireland—having with his seraphic symphonies touched and kindled into the purest ecstasy, with his stanzas addressed to the "Sister of Charity," the most lawless and reckless scapegrace in and about Dublin—after having drained to the dregs, as Gerald Griffin did, in his London garret, the cup which all men of genius and sincerity, without any magnificent insolvencies to suckle from, find it profitable to do, even in this Democratic Commonwealth—wandering from the wooded outskirts of the Liffey, where he lived, as hundreds of brave young students did, hungering for the realization of the ideal which their love and converse with the stormy past, sustained by their intellectual identification, vehement and intense—for such it was—with the Bards and Chiefs of the antique and Medieval days of Ireland, evoked—wandering to these shores, through palmetto and magnolia groves, our gentle-minded, bright-souled friend, Richard D'Alton Williams, has found his shelter—his sweet shelter and his solace—in a poet's Elysium, at last. In a word, Shamrock is married.

Speranza, with her resonant, stately rhymes—Mary, with sounds as sweet and throbbing as the Shandon bells—Eva, with all the wild music of the Loughs and Brakes westward of the Shannon—Desmond, with the combined spirit of the "race of McCanra," waking all the echoes from Ceim-en-neigh to Cairn Thuathl—the poor weaver of Belfast, who wove in the midst of sordid linen such brilliant textures of Hope and Faith—Barry, who, with shrouded head and humbled cadences still lisps in canticles for the Irish Conscripts who fell in heaps at Inkermann—all the minstrels, loving and glowing, who urged a dead nation into life, surround the bridal altar of our friend Shamrock, weaving shamrocks with the white blossoms which bloom for him in the forest-gardens of the Mississippi.

THE LATE CAPTAIN KERRIGAN.

Several weeks have elapsed since the painful duty of noticing the death of this true-hearted Irishman devolved upon us. In the meantime his friends have not been forgetful of him. Those he left lonely—his wife and child—have been the objects of the most careful interest and solicitude. His old comrades in arms, from the moment their captain breathed his last, adopted his family as the favorites of their corps. To Lieutenant Greene the largest thanks are due for the modest but most generous evidence he gave of the feelings which in these few words, on behalf of the Irish Dragoons, we have so imperfectly expressed. At his suggestion, and with the full sanction and liveliest co-operation of the officers and privates of the Irish military organizitions of New-York, a lecture will be, in a short time—certainly before the end of November—delivered by the Editor of the Irish News. The object of the lecture is already obvious from these remarks. To provide a competence for the widow and offspring of a man whose purse and heart, whose hand and hospitality, were ever open when a forlorn countryman of his required its help and warmth—this is the pious and grateful aim of the lecture, to which, for the first time, we give this publicity.

Not for any vague and driftless project—not for any profitless expenditure of charity and enthusiasm—do we write these words. A good, gracious, substantial act is to be done—done by Irish soldiers in the service of the American Republic—and we feel confident that the intimation we whisper in these syllables—faint and inconsecutive as they are—will insure in the Tabernacle, before the snow falls, or the glorious red leaves have turned to white ashes on his grave, the grandest crowd of bayonets, plumes, and helmets that have ever flung brilliancy on that favorite Forum of our Democracy.

For this occasion—as pious, useful, and gracious, as ever drew gallant men together—let the Irish soldiers of our Militia reserve their zeal and husband their resources.

European Notes.

Europe is dull enough just now, the only occurrences which agitate it being the echoes of the gorgeous mummery attending the Coronation of the Russian Emperor, and the up-heaving of a fresh tide of chartist agitation in England, consequent upon the return of John Frost. A meeting of welcome to the exile was held at which were present ten thousand persons, Ernest Jones presiding.

Switzerland has repudiated the claims of Prussia on its canton. The Suisse journal announces that the Federal Council has replied to the note presented to it by the Prussian representative (M. de Sydow) in reference to Neufchatel, in which note the Prussian Government reserved its right of sovereignty over the canton.

In reply, the Federal Council declares that it cannot admit the right claimed by Prussia, for the reasons already expressed in the negative reply of the Federal Directory of the 1st and 6th of March, 1848 ; and the Council expresses regret that events in every way deplorable, should have given a motive for the renewal of the protest. According to the same journal, M. de Sydow had an interview with M. Stompfli, President of the Federal Council, from whom he demanded that the prisoners should be treated with kindness, and that the judicial inquiry and trial should not be too hastily conducted, as such a course might complicate still more the diplomatic relations of Prussia with the Confederation, and might create fresh difficulties.

We are glad to find that Mr. John Vance, of the 12th Ward, has received the regular Democratic nomination for the 60th Council District. Mr. Vance is a sound Democrat, and will, we are certain, receive the cordial and unanimous support of the Democratic party.

BY GARLAND O'HALLORAN.

They were packed like swine in the dark and suffocating entrails of the ship—tier above tier of human wretchedness and squalor, and in such confusion that decency and the distinctions of sex were speedily lost sight of. Girls of notorious character were on board, and not only associated freely with the rest, but exercised, through the sailors and mates, an authority which it was neither easy nor quite safe to resist. In company with the ruffians who "protected" them, they usurped the passengers' fire-galley from morning till night; nothing could be cooked without their leave: not so much as a drop of boiling water could be had to make tea for a dying mother, unless the daughter who asked it courted the favor of these prostitutes by a bribe, or purchased the assistance of some ruffian at a price not fit to be recorded. The captain replied to all complaints with an oath; the mates were leaders of the disorder, and, therefore, nothing could be hoped from them. The supercargo—of whom more anon—declared the idea of complaining when they reached New York, was about the best joke of the season—more substantial than the sea-serpent and quite as funny as the woolly horse!

The ship was as yet but ten days out and already the captain had proclaimed her short of provisions: half rations and a quart of water per diem must henceforth be the order of the day.

Among the passengers on board were two young girls from the County Wexford, with whom Ned Morgan soon struck up an acquaintance, and in whose behalf the best feelings of our hero were quickly interested. They were sisters, named Anne and Ellen Plunkett, and had taken a little state-room in the second cabin, where Morgan also stayed. Their dress and conversation bespoke them of a better class than the average of their associates, with whom they held as little intercourse as possible. In particular, they avoided the society of a Mrs. Muldoon, a handsome, flashy-looking, noisy woman, who declared herself en route to join her husband at Troy, but whose intimacy with the chief mate—a swarthy-visaged ruffian called Maine—was notorious to every one on board. Far from being ashamed of, or wishing to conceal this fact, Mrs. Muldoon, with a strange infatuation, seemed to glory in her infamy, and never lost an opportunity of displaying the power which the mate's protection conferred. At first she tried to curry favor with the Plunketts, but finding her advances firmly, though cautiously repulsed, every energy of her bitter spirit was thenceforward directed to make them feel her vengeance. Their room was kept by far the neatest and cleanliest in the ship, but Mrs. Muldoon complained of it as a nuisance, likely to breed disease. Maine answered with a grin, and said, "I guess I'll fix 'em for you!" In another minute he returned, followed by one of the stow-aways, with two buckets of greasy slops from the cook's galley. Pushing the door of the bedroom open, the two girls were discovered on their knees before an ivory crucifix, which hung above their berth. The boards they knelt on were cleaner than the captain's table; the spotless linen on the bed; the taste with which some simple draperies were arranged; the books which stood upon the shelf, and the prints which did their best to give an air of comfort to the naked walls—all these presented a picture, the like of which for cleanliness or cheerfulness could nowhere else be found on board that floating hell.

"Shall I do it?" asked Maine, taking a bucket from the stow-away.

"It's odious—it poisons the cabin!" replied his paramour, with a glance of triumphant malice. "It raaly ought to be washed out by somebody, for them girls is a disgrace."

Anne and Ellen had not risen from their knees. More astonished than frightened, they looked round to see of whom the parties could be speaking.

"Here goes then!" cried the ruffian, and in another instant the bed was deluged with the abominable mixture, the girls springing to either side in time to avoid the stream.

Maine was about to give them the other bucket, when a strong hand wrested it from his grasp; in another instant he was sprawling, apparently lifeless, on the floor—his head receiving a deep gash from the corner of a trunk against which he fell; while Mrs. Muldoon, who was staring open-mouthed at this unexpected rebellion, received the contents of bucket number two in her very teeth.

It was Ned Morgan, who had entered unobserved while the outrage was in perpetration, and gave it this peculiar turn. He had long looked indignantly on the scenes going on around him, and nothing but the remonstrances of O'Reilly, who knew the almost absolute power of a captain at sea, had hitherto restrained his indignation.

"Wait, Ned," said Casement, when the former urged resistance to allowing the poor ignorant passengers to be reduced to half their stipulated rations. "In that matter, the law would take the captain's part, as it supposes him best qualified to judge what will be the length of the voyage; but find out among the steerage-men three or four you may rely on, and whenever any positive outrage is attempted, then resist to your heart's content, and I will aid you to the last drop of my blood. This is but the tenth day out, and crew and officers grow more audacious every hour; wait till we are once clearly in the right, and we will give them a lesson they little dream of."

Such was the advice given the night before, and the opportunity then hoped for had been given much sooner than was expected.

While Maine was slowly recovering his senses, Mrs. Muldoon, almost inarticulate with rage and blind with slops, was thundering with her clenched fists against the captain's door.

In a few moments, Hezekiah Runt—a little, one-eyed, blaspheming, drunken beast, with the face of a rat and the soul of a glutton—rushed down the companion-way, and was followed by the supercargo and O'Reilly. The two former were armed with a brace of pistols each, which they levelled simultaneously at Morgan, at the same time commanding him to surrender.

A sweep of the empty bucket sent the pistols into the further corner of the cabin; another laid the supercargo beside the mate, and a third would infallibly have sent the captain to keep company with them, had not O'Reilly interposed.

The room began to fill. Some of the crew were attached to Maine from the fact that he winked at their debauchery and befriended them in every outrage; but the captain was universally detested. Had it not been for this, and another thing, it might have gone hard with Ned.

The other thing referred to was the presence of some half-dozen of the sturdiest and most respectable fellows in the steerage, who, inspired by Morgan's example, and encouraged by O'Reilly's countenance, now ranged themselves around the mutineer and declared they would stand by him to the last.

The captain was paralyzed; the supercargo glared in helpless amazement at a revolution so suddenly effected; the mate kept wiping the blood from his eyes, and seemed to ask himself was this a dream; while Mrs. Muldoon, the te-terrima causa belli, what with her tears, the greasiness, and her dripping garments, might have enacted the part of a Niobe, a Kitchen-wench, or a Cloacina just risen fron her bath, with equal picturesqeness and effect.

"You do not understand this matter," Captain, interposed Casement; "if you did," continued he, knowing that the bibulous little sea-dog was very open to flattery, "I am confident your high honor and sense of right would lead you to take part against your officer. But this is not the place for discussion," he went on to say: "Morgan, put down your bucket, and take your foot off the supercargo's neck. If the Miss Plunketts and any others who were present at the late outrage will follow us to the quarter-deck, I am sure I may promise for my friend Captain Runt that justice will be done."

The natural superiority of the speaker enforced obedience as if by magic. He spoke not in the tone of one commanding, but as if he were well assured that the mere expressson of his wishes and their obvious justice would at once be obeyed. An adjournment to the quarter-deck was made nem. con., and the proceedings terminated in the ejection of Mrs. Muldoon from the second cabin, and the nominal arrest of Ned Morgan, who submitted (for the sake of peace and on Casement's representation that it would be as well not to push matters too far,) to be confined to his cabin for the next four-and-twenty hours.

But who shall paint the rage of the mate—the frenzy of the supercargo, or the jeers and shouts which greeted Mrs. Muldoon, as she was driven into the forepart of the ship!

"Throth it's a proud welcome she'll get from the honest man that's workin' hard for her in Throy," cried one.

"Shure since she got the mate herself, it was only dacint for Ned Morgan to give her the basting!" said another, in allusion to the grease and potato peelings which were tangled in her hair and clothes.

"Hould yer tongues, ye omadhawns," cried a third, "and make room for the great lady to go by! Give her a wide berth, ye cripples, and send a good letther of recommendation along wid her to her husband."

The triumph of the passenger-party was complete, and the humiliation of the officers proportioned to their former insolence. Regular watches were formed in the steerage, to guard the hatchways and allow no sailor to go down at unreasonable hours. The reign of the prostitutes was broken, and they were glad to take shelter in company with Mrs. Muldoon, in a space partitioned off immediately beneath the sailors' forecastle.

The supercargo, as we have hitherto called him, was in reality nothing of the kind. Before leaving Liverpool, he had been addressed as "Doctor"—a title in this country of very wide application, and no particular significance. The presence of a doctor on board, was one of the inducements held out to passengers by the shipping house: "The vessels of our line always carry a competent physician," they stated. "We would as soon, or sooner send a vessel to sea without a captain, for the mate might supply his place; but in case of an epidemic, (which God forbid!) who could supply the doctor's?"

The shipping agent almost wept as he anathamatized "that recklessness of life which induced other houses" to send their living cargoes afloat unprovided with a professor of therapeutics; and if any hesitating passenger wished to see the doctor—on the principle that seeing is believing—he was at once introduced to "Doctor George Washington Brand, of Tehuantepec College, in the state of Onondaga"—a physician to whose skill the shipping agent himself owed the lives of a wife and nine small children, who had been given over as incurable by all the most eminent authorities of England, not to speak of some German and Parisian professors imported specially for the occasion.

As soon as the vessel was fairly at sea, however, the doctor discovered that the whole statement was a mistake! His friend, the Captain, he said, had a medicine chest, (senna, epsom salts, and castor oil,) from which his friend, he was sure, would be happy to supply every drug that could possibly be needed; but as for himself, he held a kind of treble character. He was supercargo of the vessel—Director general of all the great lines of travel by which emigrants are conveyed to their destinations in the United States; and he also held a special appointment from Government to investigate and report upon certain gross and dangerous frauds which had recently been committed by unprincipled parties, and so forth, upon "the innocent and virtuous people daily landed on the quays of that everlasting republic, whose liberality," and so forth with a long et cætera.

Such was the substance of the statement which he made with much pot-house grandiloquence to the assembled and admiring steerage. He was a red-faced, broken-nosed, vulgar looking fellow, with a spotted belcher round his neck, a claret-colored velvet vest, mosaic jewelry, a bottle-green coat, and a white felt hat, stuck jauntily on one side of his head. His eyes had the cunning twinkle of petty larceny, and his lower jaw would have furnished an admirable illustration to any one lecturing on the subject of the passions which man shares in common with the brutes.

The villain was in fact one of the most notorious and audacious runners ever licensed by the municipality of New-York, to swindle the ignorant and defenceless. The pauper establishments were thronged with miserable victims who had given him their last dollar for tickets which proved worthless when presented. He had robbed them of their baggage—they were unable to go West, where labor was the one thing needful—and so it came to pass that some lay down and died of absolute starvation—some went mad, others were committed to "the island," and not a few took refuge from this bitterest disappointment, in the waters of the Hudson or East River.

The Grand Jury had grown weary of indicting him—the petty jury had made small fortunes by his acquittals. Like other runners of the old school, he had taken up politics as another branch of swindling; and "in his own ward," the influence of George Washington Brand (in his younger days he had been called Timothy—or Tim, for shortness,) was a thing which no candidate could afford to overlook, and for which the successful one had to pay exorbitantly.

Arrested on a thousand charges—for assault, seduction, rape, homicide, embezzlement—for obtaining money under false pretences, and obtaining it without any pretences at all,—for one and all of these offences, "the alderman of his own ward," became his bail, and the clerk found it convenient to allow him the picking of his own jury. The papers would have found it true economy to have had the fact of his arrest and bailment stereotyped. He was the oracle of primary elections—the patron of M. P.'s—a wholesale dealer in that quality of straw which is used for bail—a useful, though not recognizable friend to many of the highest officials in the corporation, and "a damned good fellow to boot," as was admitted in every grog-shop between Canal street and the Battery.

All these things was G. W., alias Tim. Brand, when his foot was ashore; but at present he was out of his element, and in the hands of an executive not open to corruption.

Ned Morgan found out and reported to O'Reilly that the fellow had already sold over fifteen hundred dollars' worth of railroad and steamboat tickets among the passengers. On examination, these tickets were found to be all struck off from one printed form—the railroad or canal line, place of destination, amount of luggage allowable, and fare being all filled in with ink in Brand's own writing. These he had sold as a great favor, and with many cautions to beware of the rogues who would surround them on debarkation. If they would give orders for their luggage to him, he would have the things conveyed to large and spacious warehouses in Greenwich street, supported by Government, whose agent he was, for this especial purpose—they should be kept there free of charge, and carried from thence to the various railroad depots on cars—also, governmental—for one sixth of the cost entailed by the ordinary conveyances. In this manner he had already got half the property on board into his hands as he fancied, and his trip seemed every way likely to pay him from ten to fifteen thousand dollars. But alas!

> "The best laid schemes of mice and men
> Gang aft agley—
> And bring us nocht but care and pain
> For promised joy."

Casement saw at a glance that these tickets were an infamous fraud. It was impossible on the very face of them that they could have been regularly issued. He called the passengers together and laid the matter before them in a few plain words. The Captain threatened to put him in irons; but the threat came trembling from his lips. One hundred and fifty sturdy arms were animated to defend the champion of the poor. "Wan of the rale ould stock too!" "Sure it takes the likes of him to know!" "An O'Reilly every inch of him?" "Orrah; dhroundin' id be a good death for the pot-bellied desayver, only he'd poison the fishes."

These and such like were the remarks which arose from the passengers assembled beneath the Vulture's quarter-deck.

"Let every thing be peaceable, my boys," cried O'Reilly; "don't be mad enough to let them get the law on their side against you. The first act of violence committed, I will abandon the contest. We are nearing shore now; the pilot will soon be aboard, and after him the officers. Let Mr. Brand, therefore, either refund every fraction of the money he has taken for these tickets—or arrest him, and hold him prisoner until you can deliver him over to the law."

"Why not take the money whether he will or no, and hang him to the yard-arm afther?"

"Och he's the divil's Brand, and we ought to lave a brand on him that he'll remember. Let us take our money first, and then drop him nately overboord."

"You see, Mr. Brand," said O'Reilly, as the cries of the passengers became more loud and furious, "you had better decide at once; for my power to restrain such passions as your conduct has aroused, is extremely precarious."

"Who's that O'Reilly that bids us be so quiet? May be its in lague wid the villain he is," cried a little sore-eyed fellow, whose drawl proclaimed him a native of the liberties of Dublin.

A clout on the side of the ear sent him spinning into the lee scuppers.

"You had better decide," exclaimed Casement, vehemently. "Give up the money, or I abandon you to your fate."

"I yield," said the ruffian, now thoroughly cowed, and suffering the most abject terror. "Only protect me. Will you promise?"

"I promise you on the honor of an O'Reilly," answered Casement.

*Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1856, by THOMAS FRANCIS MEAGHER, in the Clerk's office of the District Court of the U. States, for the Southern District of New-York.

"But have you power to protect me? They seem uncontrollably furious?"

"They shall kill me before they harm you," was the prompt response. "But you must be quick."

In another hour every man had received back his money, and the tickets were returned to the disheartened vender. Shortly after, when the pilot got aboard, his boat dropped under the stern windows of the cabin, and George Washington Brand slid ignominiously down, indebted for his life, perhaps, to Casement's firmness, but vowing vengeance deep and black as hell against both him and Morgan.

He is not a character to be soon lost sight of. We shall doubtless hear of him again. As for Captain Runt, he, too, was pretty thoroughly frightened, and now disowned the ejected supercargo altogether. He was called "supercargo," because he had been supercargo on other vessels; but he had no more official connexion with the Vulture, than had Mr. Casement O'Reilly himself.

Such is the power of one firm will amongst a multitude of lesser resolutions. There were scores on board as brave—yet had it not been for the calm purpose exhibited by O'Reilly, what scenes of misery and vice must the latter part of a voyage so begun, have evolved! What a mass of human wretchedness, without money, without baggage, without virtue, without hope, would have been spewed out upon the docks of Coenties slip, from the bowels of that ocean bird of ominous name!

MEMORIES.

Memory's whispers still remind me—
Whispers soft and low—
Of the land I left behind me,
Long years ago.
Sounds that through the past are breaking,
Homestead doors their welcomes creaking,
Voices of my kindred speaking,
Long years ago.

The ruin 'mong the grassy pillows,
Where the dead lie low;
The church among the weeping willows,
White as Heaven's snow:
Liffey's stream, its sandy ridges,
Sunset's gleam where dance the midges,
Caught by swallows 'neath the bridges,
Long years ago.

Leafy members of the wildwood,
Waving to and fro,
Where the Congress of my childhood
Gather'd years ago.
Round me now their forms are sweeping,
Round me happy thoughts are leaping,
'Till my heart with joy is weeping,
O'er long years ago.

Wear they now those happy features,
All with mirth aglow?
Has misfortune changed their natures,
With its weight of woe?
'Till like, me by memory started,
They roam in thought, all broken hearted,
To that home from whence we parted,
Long years ago?

Fancy, oh! why dost thou linger,
O'er those years ago?
Tracing with impressive finger,
Scenes that bring me woe.
From that home which God had given,
Where we've early toiled and striven,
Father, mother, all were driven,
Long years ago.

Where the starry banner fluttered,
O'er the brave and free,
With such memories have I uttered
Oaths of fealty.
I cannot scorn my ragged brother,
Nor forget my Irish mother—
But can this one feeling smother
Of gratitude to thee?

No, Columbia! for if danger
Round thy pathway grows,
Then thou'lt see the Irish stranger
Grapple with thy foes.
Each slumbering sense to vengeance waking,
As he shrieks of fond hearts breaking,
When to his soul the past is speaking
Wrongs of years ago.

New Orleans. S. E. C.

The first play copyrighted in New York under the new law, was Mr. Charles Walcott's farce of "A Good Fellow." It was registered on the first day permitted by the statute. "My Wife's Mirror," (a farce by Mr. Wilkins, from a French story called "Le Miroir du Diable," in Le Moniteur de la Mode for March and April), was the second play entered here as copyright. A dramatic version of "Dred," by John Brougham, has already been entered, and will be published in a few days.

The Daily Times informs us that John Saunders, the founder and original editor of the People's Journal, has joined with Westland Marston, author of "The Patrician's Daughter," and other dramatic poems, in establishing a new illustrated periodical of literature, art, science, social progress, and family life. It is called the National Magazine, published weekly at four cents a number. It promises well.

THE GAEL.

BY JOHN O'MAHONY.

[This interesting antiquarian resume on the history of "The Gael" is from the pen of John O'Mahony, and is an admirable specimen of the ability and research which that devoted scholar has brought to his "labor of love," in translating old Geoffrey Keating's History, from the early proof-sheets of which we print the following. In reply to many inquiries, we may safely state that the delay in the publication of the work will be much to the advantage of the subscribers, as Mr. O'Mahony is devoting his most earnest attention to the annotation of the text. The subject has grown with the translator's love for the history and antiquities of the fatherland, and with the consciousness peculiar to him, he desires rather to exhaust the subject than to barely touch upon it. The publisher has procured an excellent map, exhibiting the locations of the old clans and septs, to further illustrate the pen-labors of Mr. O'Mahony on the same subject. This commendable feature did not enter into the original prospectus, and the subscribers may congratulate themselves.]

Gauls.—The Irish designated the earlier Anglo Norman and British invaders that had settled amongst "Sen-Ghaill," (Shan Ghoill), i. e., "Old Gauls," or "strangers." These settlers were also called "Strongbownians," from their leader, Richard de Clare, Earl of Pembroke, and Stogul, who had received the nickname of "Strongbow," from his expertness in archery. These early colonists soon adopted the manners and habits of the Irish, with whom they quickly amalgamated, and they became, as the English writers of the day said of them, ipsis Hibernis Hiberniores, i. e., more Irish than the Irish themselves. A marked distinction was therefore made between them and the "Nuadh-Ghaill"—No-ghoill, or later invaders. They never called themselves "Sasanaigh," or Saxons, nor was that hated term ever applied to them by the natives. They are always styled either "Brethnaigh"—Brehnigh—i. e., Britons or Gauls, as here. The term Gall, or Gaul, was not given to them as a generic name, though the vast majority of them were, in truth, Gallo-Normans by descent. They were so called merely because they were "strangers." Thus we shall see the Irish calling the Scandinavian sea-rovers, Finn-Ghaill and Dubh-Ghaill—Doo-Ghoill—i. e. "Fair and Black Strangers," though they certainly were not of the Gallic nation.

Gael.—In more ancient Irish manuscripts, this word is found written, Gaedal, or with the aspiration Gaedhal. It is now universally spelled Gaodhal, for the moderns, by a corrupt innovation, always replace the "ae" of the ancients by "ao."

Throughout this work, the form "Gael," shall be used in translating the word, wherever it is used in a national or generic sense. It has been received into the English language under this latter form, which represents pretty nearly its modern pronunciation. The editor rejects the form "Gadelian," because it disguises the dipthong "æ," which he considers an essentially radical element of the word, while it does not at all add to the facility of its pronunciation in English. He thinks the name of kindred origin with "Gaetulus," or "Gaetuli," a name by which a nation of northern Africa was designated by the Romans. This is the true national or generic name of that portion of the great Celtic family which inhabits both the Scottish highlands and Ireland. The manner in which it has been introduced into English, has misled many learned inquirers into comparative etymology, leading them to fancy that it had some relationship with the word, "Gallus," or "Gaul," other than that of most total opposition. To add to the errors already broached upon the subject, Dr. O'Brien, in remarking on the letter "a," in his Irish Dictionary, has devoted a large space to proving that these two most antagonistic words, "Gaedhal," or Gael, and "Gall," or Gaul, were originally derived from the same source, and had been in the beginning applied to one people. His object in this forced, and, I am sorry to think, wilfully deceitful attempt, was, apparently, to support some of the wild etymological fantasies of General Vallancey, and antiquarians of his school. Though the Doctor's reasons are beneath criticism, and perfectly ridiculous to any one who knows even a little of the Gaelic language, in which the words are as hostile to each other as friend is to foe, or as black is to white, or as any two terms can possibly be; still, I am induced to notice his imposition here, by the fact that he has thereby misled some really learned and truth-seeking writers, both at home and on the Continent. Moore quotes him as an authority upon what he calls the adventitious letters interpolated by the Irish Bards. The learned Thierry has been led by him to suppose that "Gallus," "Celta," "Gaul," &c., and "Gaedhal" or "Gael," were but dialectic variations of the same original appellation. As a basis for his assumption, Dr. O'Brien makes the following assertion, which, after his own etymological researches, he must have known to be unfounded. Having remarked upon that property of the Gaelic tongue, by which no two or more vowels coming together, can form distinct syllables, he goes on to say: "For which reason our bards or versificators, who frequently wanted to stretch out words, or by multiplying their syllables, according to the exigency of their rhymes, devised the method of throwing in between the two vowels an adventitious consonant (generally a 'd' or 'g' aspirated by 'h'), in order to stretch out and divide the vowels into two different syllables. As this consonant was "quite foreign to the natural frame of the word, so it entirely corrupted and disguised its radical form and structure."

Now I deny that our bards did devise any such method for "stretching out their rhymes," and I challenge examples, from any correctly written manuscript, that will show that the letters he would style adventitious, do not belong either to the radical frame of the word, or to its regular grammatical inflection. The proof that the letters are not adventitious, may easily be had, by comparing the words in which they occur with their cognate terms in other Indo-European dialects; in some one of which the letters, mortified or silenced in Irish, will ever be found fully sounded. The truth seems to be that these aspirations or silencings of medial and final letters, were the peculiar mode of corruption by which the Gaels dissimilated their tongue from the "Lingua prisca," or primitive language of the Japetian tribes of Europe and Asia.

Whether that essential difference and one or two other minor ones, was caused by either Semitic, Uralian, or Finnish admixture, is a question that well merits the investigation of the comparative philologist. It would favor our Phenician theories, did these peculiarities belong altogether to the Gaelic, but they pervade the whole family of the tongues called Celtic. To the candid etymologist, the retention of such silent letters, in the written and in the poetic language, will not seem to be innovations. He will rather consider it a proof of the resistance given by the Irish ollamhs and bards to the linguistic corruptions of the vulgar. For, if these ollamhs and bards did innovate, how is it that, isolated, as they undoubtedly were, from the learned of the world, they always chanced to hit upon the proper radical letter that should be inserted in order to make the written word correspond in outward appearance with its Greek, Latin, or Sanscrit cogener? Are we to suppose that these ollamhs and bards, whose education was purely local and professional, were skilled in the very recent science of comparative philology? Are we to believe all that the venerable Keating has transcribed for us of the royal schoolmaster, Fenius Farsa, and of that universal savant, Gaedal, son of Ethor? And yet we must either do that, and allow a knowledge of comparative philology to our bards and shanachies, of which the most learned amongst modern philologists might feel proud, or we must allow that these silent and aspirated letters, which pervade the whole frame-work of the Gaelic tongue, are not adventitious. But it is much easier to allow that these letters were pronounced at the time, when the words in which they occur were first committed to writing, and that the Ollamhs, Druids and Bards preserved their orthography thus unaltered notwithstanding the changes which the spoken language underwent from popular corruption. This is no place to cite many examples of the class of words I mean; for such I refer the learned reader to the erudite work of M. Pictet upon the Analogies of the Sanscrit with the Celtic tongues. Unluckily for Dr. O'Brien's assumption, the cogener of the word we spell Gaedal, but pronounce Gael, is still preserved in a neighboring Indo-European language. In the Cimbric or Kimric, i. e., the Welsh, the Irish or Gaels, are called "Guydhill," with the "dh" as fully pronounced as the "th" in the English word "whither." Now, our Cimbric neighbors were not first taught our name from books. They must have heard our forefathers, when first brought into contact with them, call themselves Gaedail or Guydhill, sounding the radical "a" fully. Otherwise, they would not have known that such a letter existed in writing. Their own language is subject to all the aspirations and mortifications of letters that ours is, but they write their words as pronounced, heedless of radicals. Now without abiding too closely to the date which the bards give as the time, when—

> "Miledh's sons first heard dread Ocean
> His music beat on Eri's shores," we must still put back the epoch, when Gael and Cimber met in western Europe to an extremely remote period, that is, to some period when the "d" was fully sounded in Gaedal. That it was not so sounded, when our Scottish kinsmen of Alba left us, some fourteen hundred years ago, we have living testimony. The Highlander aspirates or silences the same letters, in the same words as the Munster-man. It has taken some thousand years and odd centuries, to make a slight dialectic and euphonic difference between Scotch and Irish Gaelic. It must have taken another, at least equal period to make the wide difference that exists between the nevertheless closely-allied languages of Wales and Ireland. This one example is, in itself, irrefragable evidence that Gaedal is no corruption of Gallus, even were our own ollamhs silent on the subject. If the natives of the country called Gallia by the Latins, were the same as the Gael, their relationship must be proved by something more founded than the accident by which Gaedal has been corrupted, so as to have a faint resemblance in sound to Gaul. In the common Irish this day spoken, "Gael" means a "kinsman," while "Gall" means a "foreigner." In the Welsh and the Armoric Breton, also "Gall" or "Gal" means foreign. In the old Anglo-Saxon, its kindred term "Wallisc" meant, stranger; hence "Welsh" or "Wallisc" came to be applied to the British inhabitants of Cambria. The German form of the word "Welsch" means foreign also—Italy is their "Welschland" or "foreigners' land." The word is seen less disguised in the name of the Walloon guards, so famous on the Continent, and in that of the people called Walli. But why multiply examples? Finding thus that the word means foreign in all the languages where any form of it occurs, the editor holds, until further proof be adduced in support of the common opinion, that the ancient Celtic inhabitants of modern France and of northern Italy—the "Gallia" or "Welschland" of ancient Rome—did never call themselves Galli at all, but that "Gallus" perhaps means in old Latin what "Gall" means in Gaelic, and what the word, in more disguised costume means in every European tongue where it is found, the old Itali called their invaders from beyond the Alps "Galli," because they were "Strangers;" and that the name continued to be applied to the people to whom it had been most particularly given, after it had lost its primitive and more extended meaning. So of the Anglo-Saxon "Wallisc;" its English form, "Welsh," has lost its more general signification, and it is now forced as a national name upon the Cimbri, whether they will have it themselves or not.

LOUIS NAPOLEON AND THE BONAPARTE FAMILY; comprising a Memoir of their Connections, with Biographichal Sketches of their principal Contemporaries, and a Summary of French History, including the Empire of Napoleon III. and the Russian War. By HENRY W. DE PUY, author of "Kossuth and His Generals." Miller, Orton, and Mulligan.

Napoleon, like all great men, was not only conscious of his power to be great, but delighted on occasions to impress others with the pleasant fact. "Come," said he to Talma, the celebrated actor, "Come to Erfurth, and you shall play before a whole pit-full of kings." The point of the audacious epigram is rendered keen by its not very great exaggeration of an historical truth. At one period of his life he might, like another Sesostris, have had his carriage drawn by kings. There is a strange grandeur attaching to him in almost every phase of his heated and marvellous career. In view of the brilliant men by whom he was surrounded, and who grew out of the system he initiated, his lustre seems only the greater by the contrast. He is the most enduring and brightest of the galaxy. He was so thoroughly a man of action, and so much involved in the world's history, that scarcely a word he ever dropped but is considered public property. "I made my 'Iliad' in action," he said himself, and the world has sanctioned the mighty egotism.

Amid the number of works on Napoleon and the men he made and unmade, suggested by the recent career of one who is desirous to follow, if he dare not emulate, the prisoner of St. Helena, the present one is commendable. It will bring to mind, in its suggestive brevity, the details which fill up more pretentious volumes. The notices of the various members of the Bonaparte family are written with clearness, as are also the sketches of Louis XVIII., Charles X., Louis Philippe, Thiers, Lamartine, Guizot, Abdel-Kader, and numerous others whose names are familiar with French movements during the present century. The outline of the Russian War is impartially given, a commendation which may be generally accorded to the entire volume.

ROBERT EMMET.

The Life and Times of Robert Emmet. By R. R. Madden, M. D., M. R. I. A. With numerous Notes and additions, and a Portrait on steel. Also a memoir of Thomas Addis Emmet. With a Portrait on steel. P. M. Haverty.

What is known as Emmet's rebellion of 1803, was a faint echo of the brave '98 war for Irish Independence which preceded it.

Inspired by the grandeur as well as by the misfortunes of the latter, by its animated devotion and heroic sacrifices, by the energy of Tone, and the sagacity of Addis Emmet, by the active life of Putnam McCabe, and the stern death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald; by the battle-fields of Antrim and Down, of Wicklow and Kildare; by the brilliant campaign of the Wexford men and their little Republic of twenty-three days existence; by the heroic frenzy of the Catholic priest-generals Murphy, Roche and Kearns, as well as the sacrificial ardor of the Presbyterian ministers Porter and Steele Dickson, nor less than the martyrdom of the Protestant clergyman, Jackson; inspired by all the genius, purity and honor that lit up the struggles of the United Irishmen, and surrounded their misfortunes with a glory which still commands the reverence of history, Robert Emmet and his friends sought to plant the flag of their country above the still wet graves and dripping scaffolds of the men who had been struck down in the attempt.

Born in Dublin on the 4th of March, 1778, (which date is now for the first time printed in Haverty's edition of the Life and Times,) Robert Emmet was but in his twenty-sixth year when he added his name to the long list of martyrs who dignify the sorrowful and startling pages of Irish History. His early youth was one of great application and severe study. Of a brilliant family, variously famous at medicine, the bar and politics; Robert displayed powers, which, had he lived, would inevitably have achieved a fame in the fields of intellectual labor, equal to that which his premature death conferred on him as a patriot and a revolutionist.

He was an old young man. The imaginative and oratorical faculty, which under other circumstances, would have broken loose in vivacious flashes, was comparatively reined in by the sombre character of the studies suggested by the occurrences of the day, and the intimate connection of some members of his family therewith.

A natural love of science also heightened his mental nature, while it subdued his youth; and forced him to be a deep thinker —unravelling questions of political and social economy, questions of men and governments at a time of life generally devoted to languid uselessness or wild dissipation.

Robert received his earliest instruction at Oswald school, "in Dopping's Court, off Golden Lane, near Bride street," after which he was under Samuel Whyte, noted as being a man of some literary pretensions, but more famous as the instructor of many celebrities, among others of Richard Brinsley Sheridan—whom he pronounced "an incorrigible dunce"—and Thomas Moore, in reference to whose youthful cleverness, the master said, "he must have been four years old before he was born."* From Whyte, young Emmet was placed under the care of the Rev. Mr. Lewis, of Camden street, who, "though a Protestant minister, was diametrically opposed to the persecution of his Catholic brethren, and failed not to instil into the mind of his young charge those doctrines which he held himself."

Thus equipped, Robert Emmet entered Trinity College in October, 1793, and after a brilliant course—which at once drew down admiration for his talents, and condemnation for the democratic theories to the illustration of which he applied them—he was expelled, with eighteen others, for declining on a certain visitation of Lord Clare, the Vice Chancellor, (February, 1798,) to give information on oath regarding the spread of United Irishism within the walls of the University.† "In the report of the Secret Committee of the Irish House of Lords, this extension of the conspiracy to the College, is termed a desperate project of the same faction, to corrupt the youth of the country, by introducing their organized system of treason into the university."

There is no doubt but that Emmet had long been convinced of the righteousness of United Irish principles, and that he was early in '98 a member of the order.

In the historical and debating societies of Trinity College, Emmet had kindled an unwonted enthusiasm, and although the discussion of political topics, especially touching the day, was forbidden, he frequently, by illustration or digression, brought the necessities of democracy vividly before his audience. For instance, after brilliantly reviewing the republics of antiquity, he referred to Cæsar carrying across the river but his sword and his Commentaries, and quickly applied his position to that of the Republican movement in France. "Thus," said he, "France at this time swims through a sea of blood, but while in one hand she wields the sword against her agressors, with the other she upholds the interests of literature uncontaminated by the bloody tide through which she struggles." Again Moore reports him as saying in one of those debates—

"When a people advancing rapidly in civilization and the knowledge of their rights, look back after a long lapse of time, and perceive how far the spirit of the then government has lagged behind them—what then, I ask, is to be done by them in such a case? What, but to pull the government up to the people!"

And again he touches broadly and suggestively the ills and means of his day. It was in a debate on the freedom of discussion. The late Judge Lefroy (who sentenced Mitchel in 1848,) had rebutted Emmet's argument, and the latter replied showing said one who was present,* 'extraordinary ability in his answer to the objections started." He concludes thus suggestively:

"If a government were vicious enough to put down the freedom of discussion, it would be the duty of the people to deliberate on the errors of their rulers, and to consider well the wrongs they inflicted, and what the right course would be for their subjects to take, and having done so, it then would be their duty to draw practical conclusions."

The democratic idea had taken full possession of him. Everything he uttered tended to illustrate the principles of popular sovereignty, in contradistinction to the regime under which his country was suffering. His enthusiasm and learning, his fearlessness and promptness on those occasions alluded to, soon made him the centre and voice of a number of brave youths, like himself in everything save the power he wielded above envy as above competition. At the same time, he became obnoxious to the college authorities, who, fearful to exhibit the nationality extending within their jurisdiction by at once putting it down, sent, as Moore says, "a man of advanced standing in the University, and belonging to a former race of good speakers in the Society," to answer Emmet, and if possible, stay "the mischievous impressions" of his "exciting and powerful appeals."

It was all to no purpose, however. The wedge was in. It was held all the firmer by the very toughness which opposed its first incision. A dozen blows, attempting to extricate it, were idle before the effect of one blow to drive it in. Emmet was not the man to be blind or wavering on this fact. He had to leave.

The transactions which quickly followed the expulsion of the students from Trinity, the treachery of Reynolds the informer, the arrest of the United Irish Deputies at Oliver Bond's House, the almost immediate seizure of Addis Emmet and MacNevin, and the general disarrangement of the plans with all of which Robert Emmet was more or less cognizant, being frequently engaged as secret messenger between the parties involved, rendered it prudent that our young hero should retire during the suspension of the habeas corpus act.

In Paris he met many of the exiled chiefs of '98, and by and with their concurrence, aided by the intrigues of Talleyrand, and the favor of Napoleon, he undertook the mission to Ireland in 1803,—to which we shall revert in a second article.

* In Moore's Diary there is a pleasant sketch of this Schoolmaster. Among other things mentioned there, is that a second edition of Whyte's Poetical works appeared in Dublin in 1792.

† There appears to be a slight doubt as to whether he resigned or was expelled. He wrote a letter of resignation; (see Madden's Life, p. 9,) but that he was expelled, cannot be questioned. Western Border Life; or What Fanny Hunter Saw and Heard in Kansas and Missouri. Derby & Jackson.

This is a political pamphlet, dribbled through a fiction, to make it more taking. It is the old thing of gilding the pill and sugaring the medicine. If the book were announced as a pamphlet against the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, the chances are that not even those opposed to that Act of Congress would care about spending money for what they have been so extravagantly dosed with many months previous, by sectional editors and voluminous newspaper correspondents. The book, therefore, was baptized with a name which, in the great desire for information concerning the West, and the fund of humor expected from a faithful daguerreotype of frontier life and customs, generally proves attractive. The author announces herself as a lady, and "Western Border Life" as her maiden effort. It has considerable talent in writing, and some of the characters are drawn with a bright and racy pencil. It is to be regretted that a subject of broader nature did not attract the author's attention and capacity.

Evelyn Marston.—Harper & Brothers.

This work opens at the time when destitution reigned among the weavers of Spitalfield, when frosts and famine were the inmates of every household, and the spinning-wheel, which brought comfort and happiness, was still. Most touchingly is all this described, and beautifully indeed are expressed the sentiments and feelings of their master, who regards them in a manner as his family, and attempts as much as possible to relieve their distress. His son, who inherits his father's nobleness and self-sacrificing spirit, is his companion in these visits of mercy. The exquisite touches in these characters, exhibit a mind of the highest order, and all who have the happiness of reading this book, will linger over the many beautiful thoughts and charming scenes, and regret when they finish the last page.

Mr. Disraeli, accompanied by his clever and wealthy wife, has left England on a continental tour. He is understood to have nearly completed another political novel, in which Lord John Russell is to get particular "fits."

CATHOLICITY AND FREEDOM.

From Sheil's Speech at Penenden Heath.

But you have been told by Lord Winchelsea that the Catholic religion is the adversary of Freedom. It may occur to you, perhaps, that his lordship affords a proof in his own person, that a passion for Protestantism and a love of liberty are not inseparably associated; but without instituting too minute or embarrassing an inquiry into the services to freedom, which in the course of his political life have been conferred by my Lord Winchelsea, and putting aside all personal considerations connected with the accuser, let me proceed to the accusation. Calumniators of Catholicism, have you read the history of your country? Of the charges against the religion of Ireland, the annals of England afford the confutation. The body of your common laws was given by the Catholic Alfred. He gave you your judges, your magistrates, your high-sheriffs—(you, Sir, hold your office, and have called this great assembly, by virtue of his institutions) —your courts of justice, your elective system, and, the great bulwark of your liberties, the trial by jury. When Englishmen peruse the chronicles of their glory, their hearts beat high with exultation, their emotions are profoundly stirred, and their souls are ardently expanded. Where is the English boy, who reads the story of his great island, whose pulse does not beat at the name of Runnymede, and whose nature is not deeply thrilled at the contemplation of that great incident, when the mitred Langton, with uplifted crosier, confronted the tyrant whose sceptre shook in his trembling hand, and extorted what you have so justly called the Great, and what I trust in God, you will have cause to designate as your everlasting Charter? It was by a Catholic Pontiff that the foundation-stone in the temple of liberty was laid; and it was at the altars of that religion, which you are accustomed to consider as the handmaid of oppression, that the architects of the constitution knelt down. Who conferred upon the people the right of self-taxation, and fixed, if he did not create, the representation of the people? The Catholic Edward the First; while, in the reign of Edward the Third, perfection was given to the representative system, parliaments were annually called, and the statute against constructive treason was enacted. It is false, foully, infamously false, that the Catholic religion, the religion of your forefathers, the religion of seven millions of your fellow-subjects, has been the auxiliary of debasement, and that to its influences the supppression of British freedom can, in a single instance, be referred. I am loath to say that which can give you cause to take offence; but when the faith of my country is made the object of imputation, I cannot help, I cannot refrain, from breaking into a retaliatory interrogation, and from asking whether the overthrow of the old religion of England was not effected by a tyrant, with a hand of iron and a heart of stone? whether Henry did not trample upon freedom, while upon Catholicism he set his foot; and whether Elizabeth herself, the virgin of the Reformation, did not inherit her despotism with her creed; whether in her reign the most barbarous atrocities were not committed; whether torture in violation of the Catholic common law of England, was not politically inflicted, and with the shrieks of agony the Towers of Julius, in the dead of night, did not re-echo? And to pass to a more recent period, was it not on the very day on which Russell perished on the scaffold, that the Protestant University of Oxford published the declaration in favor of passive obedience, to which your Catholic ancestors would have laid down their lives rather than have submitted? These are facts taken from your own annals, and with every one you should be made familiar; but it is not to your own annals that the recriminatory evidence, on which I am driven to rely, shall be confined. If your religion is the inseparable attendant upon liberty, how does it come to pass that Prussia, and Sweden, and Denmark, and half the German states, should be Protestants, and should be also slaves? You may suggest to me, that in the larger portion of Catholic Europe freedom does not exist; but you should bear in mind that at a period when the Catholic religion was in its most palmy state, freedom flourished in the countries in which it is now extinct. Look at Italy, not indeed as she now is, but as she was before Martin Luther was born, when literature and liberty were associated, and the Arts imparted their embellishments to her free political institutions. I call up the memory of Italian Catholic republics in the great cause which I am sufficiently adventurous to plead before you. Florence, accomplished, manufacturing, and democratic, the model of your own municipal corporations, gives a noble evidence in favor of Catholicism; and Venice, Catholic Venice, rises in the splendor of her opulence and the light of her liberty, to corroborate the testimony of her celebrated sister with a still more lofty and majestic attestation. If from Italy I shall ascend the Alps, shall I not find in the mountains of Switzerland, the sublime memorials of liberty, and the reminiscences of those old achievements which preceded the theology of Geneva, and which were performed by men, by whom the ritual of Rome was uttered on the glaciers, and the great mystery of Catholicism was celebrated on the altars which nature had provided for that high and holy worship? But Spain, I may be told, affords the proof that to the purposes of despotism her religion has always lent its impious and disastrous aid. That mistake is a most signal one, for when Spain was most devotedly Catholic, Spain was comparatively free—her Cortes assumed an attitude nobler even than your own Parliament, and told the King at the opening of every session in which they were convened, that they were greater and invested with a higher authority than himself. In the struggles made by the Spaniards, within our own memory, we have seen the revival of that lofty sentiment; while amongst the descendants of Spaniards, in the provinces of South America, called into existence in some sort by yourselves, we behold no religion but the Catholic, and no government of which the principle is not founded in the supremacy of the people. Republic after republic has arisen at your bidding through that immesurable expanse, and it is scarce an exaggeration to say (if I may allude to a noble passage in one of the greatest writers of our times), that liberty, with her "meteor standard" unfurled upon the Andes,

"Looks from her throne of clouds o'er half the world."

False, I repeat it, with all the vehemence of indignant asseveration, utterly false is the charge habitually preferred against the religion which Englishmen have laden with penalties, and have marked with degradation.

The Thomas Davis Guard.

This fine contingent of our "Independent Militia," (A. Maguire, Commandant,) had a target excursion to Weehawken, on Monday, the 15th ult. A spirited contest for several valuable prizes took place. Their target bears witness to the dexterity of the marksmen. On the ground, we are informed that they were vehement in their cheers for Buchanan and Breckinridge, and that they toasted, with all the honors so justly their due, the healths of John Mitchel and President Walker.

It is rumored that Mr. Cobden is employing the Parliamentary recess in the composition of a Democratic History of England.

A bust of Edwin Forrest went out by the steamer Texas to Mr. Thomas McGuire, who has built and named a theatre after the tragedian, at Sacramento.

Literary and Artistic News.

A Brussels correspondent of the Augsburg Allgemine Zeitung gives the following touching picture of a noted literary man:

"In the streets of Brussels may be seen, from time to time, an old, poorly clad man, with snow-white hair, a fine, expressive face, and beautiful, intelligent eyes. His black dress-coat is threadbare, and his cap so weather-stained that it would be impossible to tell the color of the cloth. His form is bent with gout, and yet he always walks very briskly, cane in hand. Sometimes he has a loaf of bread under his arm, a bottle of beer, or a little butter on a cabbage-leaf. Every time I pass him, I bow to him, though personally I do not know him. The man lives in a miserable garret in the Rue du Marais, where there is no fire in the winter; a poor bed, a few chairs, an old secretary, books and MSS., comprise his furniture. This man is Joachim Lelewel, now 70 years of age, the most celebrated Polish writer of modern times, who, during the Polish revolution, was Minister of Public Instruction, and since 1833 has lived at Brussels. He refuses all sympathy, from friends as well as admirers, but lives in self-imposed poverty, from the scanty income derived from his literary labors. A professorship of history, which the Belgian government, and afterwards the University, had offered him, he refused to accept. An old lady of noble birth died recently, who esteemed the learned Polish refugee so highly, that, though not knowing him personally, she left him a legacy of six hundred francs a year. I don't know whether he has accepted it."

"Malakoff," in a Paris letter to the N. Y. Daily Times, says: "The letter of M. Proudhon on virtue, has made a veritable sensation at Paris. Its publication has stimulated others, and now we have a perfect inundation of epistolary efforts in the same style. An old one written by the same gentleman, and two from the pen of John Jacques Rousseau, are among the number published. One of those signed by the hand of Rousseau, was in answer to a danseuse of the Grand Opera, who demanded of the great philosopher the road to virtue. Rousseau rather naively admits that, although he is not exactly the proper person to give advice upon such a subject, (not on account of his principles or his habits, dear reader, but of age, which was then sixty!) that yet he did not live upon such slippery ground as that of the Opera, and might, therefore, venture a word of advice; and here the man of sixty, who confessed on paper that he wished to be considered still in the category of men who are allowed to show gallantry to ladies, utters to the young lady the astounding proposition that a woman may even be virtuous on the boards of the Grand Opera!

Douglas Jerrold, one of the famed clique of London Punch satirists is coming to America to lecture. Jerrold commenced life as a sailor, and after six years of salt water experience became a compositor in a London newspaper office. His first literary achievement was an essay on German music, which the author, after the manner of Benjamin Franklin, dropped into that lion's mouth, the editor's box, where he was a printer, and two days after he had the delight of setting up his own article, none of the editors being aware of the author's name. Jerrold next dropped another anonymous article in the box on Fashionable Charity, which is written with all his peculiar vigor. This caused so great a stir that the editor, in his notices to correspondents, begged the author to call upon him—in other words, he was requested to "Stand and unfold himself." He did, much to the astonishment of the editor, who at once recognized his talents, took him from the case and put him to the desk.

The novelist, W. Gilmore Simms, of South Carolina, has enrolled himself among the lecturers for next winter's campaign. His subject will be "Rural Life at the South," and the novelty of the theme treated by a Southerner, as well as curiosity to hear the author of "Eutaw," "Guy Rivers," and "Katheline Walton," will insure large audiences. J. W. Redfield, his New-York publisher, is his agent with lecture committees.

It is a curious circumstance that a bona fide magnifying glass, identified by Sir Edward Brewster as decidedly and designedly such, was recently found by Mr. Layard in one of the temples of Nineveh. Mr. Layard says that many of the cuneiform inscriptions and other smaller sculptures are so delicately cut, and so minute, as to be almost unintelligible without a magnifying glass.

A distinguished doctor in Great Britain has announced his belief that the fashionable bonnet, worn on the back-comb, and only protecting the bump of philoprogenitiveness, is a fruitful cause of neuralgia! It begets ear-ache, tooth-ache, ulcerated gums, tic doloreux, and all that—but it gives promenaders a better chance to see lovely faces, and that balances the account.

The new volume, (the XIth) of the "Encyclopedia Britannica," brings the work down to the article "Humboldt." The Biography of Thomas Hood is accredited to R. M. Milnes, the poet.

We regret to hear of the continued and increasing illness of John G. Saxe. The stroke of paralysis which afflicted him during the last winter, seems to have terminated in a complete prostration.

Messrs. Francis, of New-York, announce a new poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, the celebrated English poetess. It extends, we believe, to several thousand lines, and is not only the largest, but the best-sustained of all her works.

THE BATTLE OF FAYAL.

From the N. Y. Herald.

Saturday (27th Sept.) was the forty-second anniversary of the battle of Fayal, which was fought between the privateer brig General Armstrong and a British squadron, consisting of the seventy-four gun ship Plantagenet, the frigate Rota and the sloop-of-war Carnation. The Armstrong, which was commanded by Capt. Sam. C. Read, was only 246 tons, and carried but seven guns and a crew of ninety men. The battle commenced on the night of the 26th of September, 1814, and ended on the morning of the 27th, the Americans obtaining a glorious victory, notwithstanding the loss of their vessel, which was afterwards burnt by the British. The loss admitted on the part of the English was 120 killed and 130 wounded. The impartial accounts, howeveve, report 160 killed and 150 wounded. The loss on the part of the Americans was only two killed and seven wounded. This is the most unprecedented and memorable naval battle on record, and was the strongest argument that Secretary Marcy could have used in his celebrated circular for not abandoning privateering. In the great battle off Cape St. Vincent in 1797, between the Spanish fleet, consisting of twenty-seven ships of the line and twelve frigates, and the English squadron, of fifteen ships of the line, seven frigates and two sloops, the English acknowledged a loss of only 73 killed and 224 wounded. In the fight with the Armstrong the English lost 87 more men killed than they did in this great conflict with the Spaniards. Admiral Jervis, who commanded the British squadron at Cape St. Vincent, was created an Earl, and had a pension allowed him by the King of £3,000 per annum, while Captain Reid, who is now in his seventy-fourth year, and his officers and crew, are yet waiting to be reimbursed by their government for the loss of their vessel.

KILKENNY ARCHÆOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

At the September meeting of this society, the following presentations among others, were received, and thanks ordered to be given to the donors:—

By Mr. M'Evoy, Urlingford; a large roll of "bog butter," found at Inch, in the Bog of Allan, near the place where the fine bronze cauldron which he deposited in the Museum last year, had turned up. The butter was found on the property of John Latouche, Esq., Harristown, in the middle of last July, by men who were engaged in cutting turf for Mr. Shea, of Urlingford, and had been nine feet beneath the surface. A few bones of animals were discovered under it, but it was not inclosed in any casing. The lump, resembling in shape exactly a modern roll of butter, was then quite perfect; but is now in three pieces, one fracture having accidentally taken place at the time of finding, and Mr. Shea having separated the remainder in the middle, in order to ascertain if any thing was concealed within it. This examination was without result. Some rudely, but pretty regularly formed firkins, containing butter and kegs of lard were discovered near the same place some years ago, but the finders broke the wooden casings, and applied the contents to farming purposes, melting down to grease the wheels of their cars, &c. Some ancient implements of warfare have also been found from time to time in the locality.

By Mr. Agent, Castle-gardens, Kilkenny: A Patrick's Penny, and a Kilkenny Penny token, struck by James Purcell, turned up in the Castle-gardens.

By the Rev. James Graves: Rubbings of an ancient Irish translation in the churchyard of Monasterboice, and of the inscription on the old bridge of Holy Cross.

The Secretary announced that the Marquis of Kildare had entrusted to the committee of the Society, for publication, a transcript of a valuable family M.S., being the memorandum book of Gerald, Earl of Kildare, commenced in the year 1518. This curious document contains the Earl of Kildare's "duties upon Irishmen," the form of doing homage, a catalogue of the Earl's library, a list of his plate; entries of the "chief horses, hackneys and harness, or armor, given by the Earl to sundry persons, English and Irish," and the obits of "diverse Ladys and Gentyllmen of the Geraldys," &c. The Noble Marquis had also given a donation of £10 to aid the publication of this valuable manuscript, by the Society.

A vote of thanks was passed to the Marquis of Kildare.

OGHAM AMULET.

The Rev. James Graves communicated the discovery of an amber bead inscribed with an ogham, which had been used as an amulet for the use of sore eyes in the county of Cork, and which had been purchased from its former owners, for Lord Londesborough.

OLD CHURCH OF BALLYHALE.

The Rev. P. Moore, R. C. C., wrote to inform the Society, that in a recent inspection which he made of the Steeple of the Chapel of Ballyhale, which was the belfrytower of the ancient church, he had discovered on west-side a niche, containing the Virgin and Child, under a Gothic canopy, such as is often seen on ecclesiastical seals, below which was a shield, bearing the Butler arms, a chief indented, all much weather-beaten. The church must have been originally a very fine building, and there yet remains two beautiful and ancient holywater fonts.

Among the correspondence were several interesting communications, which shall be published in our next.
